Helicopters get your goat

CHELSEA choppers are getting the goat of residents.

As a result of complaints, the council is urging Chelsea residents to take part in a study designed to find ways to reduce noise and improve the quality of life for people affected by helicopter flights.

Researchers from London South Bank University, who are undertaking the study, are looking for residents within a three-mile radius of Battersea Park to house small noise monitors temporarily in their homes.

Data from the "chopper checkers" will then be used to measure and map the noise created by helicopters using London Heliport in Battersea.

"The research is the first of its kind to be carried out in the country and will be used to find ways to potentially reduce noise and improve the quality of life for residents affected by helicopter flights," said a council spokesman. "The devices will record 'noise energy' and will not be listening to any private household conversations – they can identify a helicopter by its sound profile. The equipment is unobtrusive and simple to use."

Residents living close to the heliport who have balconies and terraces overlooking the Thames are also needed to give a short-term home to outdoor sound-recording equipment. Cllr Tim Ahern, the Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea's cabinet member for environmental health, said: "I know that noise from the helicopters is an issue for many Chelsea residents."

"I urge anyone who has had problems to take part in this study which will help measure the noise of helicopters using the heliport."

To take part in the study, email Martin Newton – secretary to the London Heliport Consultative Group – at mnewton@wandsworth.gov.uk or call 020 8871 6488.

Free advice to help beat mental illness

Top doctor becomes London Weekly News' psychologist in residence

BY GEOFF BAKER

geoff@londonweeklynews.co.uk

AS London plunges into the biggest mental-health crisis that the city has ever known, a top Kensington psychologist is launching in this newspaper a new easy-access direct consultancy aimed at helping the tens of thousands suffering from the illness.

Dr Shamender Talwar, who practises across West London, is to become the London Weekly News' psychologist in residence. Each week he will tackle readers' problems with mental illness and will provide expert advice on how to help beat them.

Dr Talwar believes that there is a psychologist inside everyone and in the weeks ahead he will teach sufferers and friends and families of sufferers how to cope and get better.

This newspaper is taking the step because of the unprecedented mental-health crisis now facing the capital.

● In Kensington and Chelsea alone, some 2,400 people are known to have a severe and enduring mental illness – the highest proportion of population known to GPs in the country.

● Some 4,200 in RBKC suffer with depression, around 15,000 suffer from anxiety and depression, 700 battle schizophrenia and 2,100 have a bipolar disorder.

● It is anticipated that there will be a nine per cent rise in the rates of depression in RBKC over the next 20 years.

● £26 billion is lost to London each year through mental-health-related issues as reduced productivity and reduced quality of life.

● At least one in 10 children is thought to have a clinically significant mental-health problem, meaning 111,000 young people in London. The impacts of childhood psychiatric disorders cost London's education system approximately £200 million per year.

● London also has the UK's highest proportion of the population with high levels of anxiety. Nearly half of Londoners are anxious, and almost a third report low levels of happiness. Life satisfaction and feelings of worth are lower than the national average.

● Most gang members have a personality disorder and one in four have psychosis, researchers at Queen Mary University have discovered.

● One in four of all Londoners will experience a mental-health condition at some point in their life.

London Weekly News chief executive Philip Evans said: "If one in four Londoners had TB there would be an outcry. But this catastrophe of widespread mental illness is just as damaging to us all."

"We cannot stand by and allow this crisis situation to get even worse and we hope that Dr Talwar providing this expert new service directly to our readers will be a help and a comfort to many who suffer from these crippling illnesses."

Why mature models find themselves in high demand

THE posters that plaster billboards all over London are supposed to sell us a life that we dream of leading – and it is usually the younger generation that represents the ideal when it comes to marketing big brands.

But according to new research, it is the more mature faces that are now in high demand.

Helen Illes, founder of Mayfair modelling company MOT Models, says it is the baby-boomer generation – those between the ages of 50 and 70 – who have the true spending power. And businesses are missing a trick if they don't cash in on their financial muscle.

"The post-war generation continues to explore exciting activities and wants to dress with style. Younger generations are struggling to make ends meet," she explains.

"Due to this we are experiencing a shift with big brands who are looking for real-life characters with true life skills.

"These models must reflect the customers and showcase the brand's sophisticated qualities. Advertisers need individuals who won't be eclipsed by big brands."

A recent report by the Institute of Customer Service found that almost two thirds of UK business leaders focus their efforts on tapping into the younger market.

But Helen believes this bias means organisations are missing out on a big chunk of the "silver pound" economy.

In a bid to burrow into the growing market, MOT has launched a "retro" division, lining up internationally renowned models to become the face of classic brands.

Over the last few months, older MOT models have appeared in photoshoots for Jaguar, Fat Face and Marks & Spencer.

Maturing stars are even featuring in campaigns for products designed to offer a more youthful look – Natasha Clancy, 39, has been used to sell OLAY, while Anna Moody, 42, promotes Activia yoghurt.

L'Oreal at 71

"Baby boomers are experiencing Photoshop fatigue," Helen says.

"They're interested in seeing characters with laughter lines rather than unrealistic, bland, over-edited features. They require someone with a strong presence and a genuine smile to capture their attention."

It is the start of a global trend, she says, with Dame Helen Mirren recently becoming the brand ambassador for L'Oreal at 71, Jan de Villeneuve, at 72, dominating London Fashion Week and Cecilia Chanceller making a modelling comeback at the age of 50.

The over-40s of previous generations instinctively behaved like older people with a set uniform of perms and pearls, Helen says. But this is no longer the case.

"The post-war generation have changed the whole of society wherever they hit with positivity at their heart," she says.

"A perfect example is Joanna Lumley, who recently turned 70 and continues to be a style icon.

"The model industry reflects society and economic trends. Television, films and adverts for big-ticket items are today geared towards the older demographic.

"Mature models represent the values of having fun, looking good and enjoying life at a time when previous generations would have slowed down.

"Our retro models are full of the life experiences, passion and positivity that is required by luxury brands – something younger models simply can't emulate."

NEWS FROM NICK

Leader of Kensington and Chelsea council, Nick Paget-Brown, writes for you

Food banks led to virtue signalling

FOOD banks are a fine and noble thing. Sometimes in the debating chamber a cloud of unreason seems to descend on my colleagues from the Labour Party. They become emotional, they make speeches that are unwittingly mock-heroic.

It seems to happen whenever they sense an opportunity to demonstrate their superior passion and humanity. It is seldom, if ever, linked to any practical action.

There is a new and useful term for this kind of behaviour: virtue signalling.

There was a veritable orgy of virtue signalling just the other week when the subject of food banks came up in debate.

Labour acts as though the growth of food banks is a searing indictment of Tory Britain. They seem to think it proves that food poverty is on the increase. But it isn't and it doesn't.

Personally, I think it is a fool's game trying to claim that British people are hungrier now than they were 10 years ago, say. Some will be, of course, but some won't.

It is certainly true that for those living only on benefits, the welfare cap and other reforms have not made life any easier.

But for those moving into work, the government has not only increased the minimum wage, it has raised the personal allowance. And it has helped those living on the state pension.

So there have been winners as well as losers.

There are other reasons for suspecting that there is no causation or even correlation between food poverty and the rise of food banks.

According to the OECD, the number of people in the UK saying they had been unable to afford food in the previous 12 months actually fell between 2007 and 2012.

One also reads that there are many more users of food banks in Germany and France than there are here in the UK.

Does that prove the French and Germans are hungrier than Britons? I don't think so, and you certainly won't be hearing Labour make that claim.

During the debate, Labour drew heavily on a recent report on local food banks by the Kensington and Chelsea Social Council.

It's a useful report which sheds some light on the issue but in it KCSC acknowledges the lack of accurate figures.

Without them, it says, "the issue remains one of speculation..., especially when seeking to influence public and policy debate".

Indeed. So rather than politicking about them, why can't we just agree that food banks are making a welcome and important contribution to our welfare arrangements?

Living on benefits is really difficult. If there is a bureaucratic delay with payment, people can find themselves in a very tight corner indeed.

Without food banks some might well go hungry. So to those who set up, donate to, and staff food banks, I applaud you. It is a fine and noble thing you are doing.

And should you be one of that small band curious as to why the council declined to embrace the food-bank motion at the council meeting the other week, well it might be because we are "nasty" as the leader of Labour group has suggested in this newspaper, or it could be that we simply prefer to prioritise the hundreds of other ways in which we are striving to alleviate the distress of our most vulnerable residents – ways which we think will do more good in the end than the ragbag of measures proposed in the motion.

School rewarded for ending taboo around mental illness

A KENSINGTON primary school has been rewarded for its work to improve staff well-being including ending the taboo around mental illness.

Efforts at St Mary Abbots School have been recognised through the London Healthy Workplace Charter and it has been awarded level-one 'commitment' status, the first school in the borough and among the first in London to achieve such accreditation.

"The London Healthy Workplace Charter, backed by the mayor of London, helps employers address issues such as sickness absence, productivity, recruitment and staff retention," said a council spokesman.

"It offers employers a framework for reviewing and developing management practices and practical considerations across a wide range of areas, including mental health and wellbeing, smoking, alcohol, physical activity and healthy eating."

There are three accreditation levels in the scheme for organisations to work towards: commitment, achievement and excellence.

St Mary Abbots head teacher Nicola Doyle said: "Going through the process of applying for the Healthy Workplace accreditation has been very empowering for us all.

"We were able to look at what we had in place and see areas that needed improving. This also means all staff feel more valued and appreciated now and know who to go to for support, and there is more of a team spirit among us all as we work together to support each other in the workplace.

"The barriers to talking about mental health here in school have certainly been broken down and it is not taboo now."

The royal borough has employed a healthy workplace adviser to provide free support for local employers in any sector interested in gaining accreditation. For more information, go to rbkc.gov.uk/healthyworkplace.

'Tax refund' email scam: council issues warning

BY GEOFF BAKER

KENSINGTON and Chelsea residents are being warned to beware a council-tax email scam that could empty their bank accounts and leave them penniless – unless they look very carefully.

Council officers have issued the alert that fraudsters are sending bogus but sophisticated emails purporting to be official and offering them a council-tax refund.

The authority sends out its own council-tax emails. But the fake emails have been created to look just like them.

Residents who are conned into providing bank-account details to the crooks put themselves at risk of having all of their money plundered.

A spokesman for the council said: "Residents of the royal borough are advised to be on their guard against attempts to con them into divulging personal details.

"This advice comes after the council has been made aware of suspicious emails which claim to offer a council-tax refund.

"These phishing emails appear to

The bogus email, about which the council has issued a warning have been timed to coincide with residents receiving their council-tax bills and include an advertising banner from a government agency to make them look credible."

The fake emails come from 'Online Council TAX UK' and contain the subject line 'Council Tax Refund Confirmation'.

The spokesman said: "The council does send emails to residents about council tax, for example about council-tax bills.

"However, these will always be sent from an email address ending with rbkc.gov.uk."

The fake email

"The latest scam serves as a timely reminder for residents to be cautious about suspicious emails"

Royal borough spokesman asks people to fill in an online form with their bank details so that the 'refund' can be credited to their bank account.

But instead of getting any money back, victims of the latest scam could find that they have no money left as fraudsters armed with their bank details will then clear out their accounts.

The council-tax fraud is the latest swindle in an epidemic of cybercrime which the national centre Action Fraud estimates cost the UK economy the loss of £11 billion last year.

And although the new phishing practice has yet to hit the royal borough's residents, the council is urging everyone to be alert.

The spokesman said: "The council is not aware of Kensington and Chelsea residents having been targeted as yet.

"However, the latest scam serves as a timely reminder for residents to be cautious about suspicious emails.

"Residents who receive council-tax emails from any address other than one ending in rbkc.gov.uk should delete the email."

If residents are unsure about a council-tax email, or have other council-tax queries, they can call the Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea's council-tax team on 020 7361 3005.

Exhibition pays tribute to women's role at hospital

THE Royal Hospital Chelsea will be soon holding an exhibition exploring the important role that women have played throughout the 325-year history of the Chelsea Pensioners.

The Women at the Royal Hospital Chelsea exhibition will take place between Thursday March 23 and Wednesday March 29, at the Royal Hospital Chelsea's Wren House.

"While the admission of female Chelsea Pensioners has been a fairly recent development, women have been an ever-present and vital part of everyday life at their historic home since it first opened its doors in 1692," said a spokesman.

"The exhibition, an initiative of the Royal Hospital's heritage team, will uncover the experience of some of the women who have lived in, worked for and contributed to the lives of the Chelsea Pensioners over the last three centuries. Staged to coincide with International Women's History Month, attention will be shifted away from the Chelsea Pensioners themselves, and from the famous faces associated with the Royal Hospital, in order to highlight previously untold stories of duty and gallantry.

"From the famous consort involved in the hospital's inception, the nurses nominated for gallantry awards in the Second World War, to the female soldiers who would take up the Scarlet Coats for the very first time, we'll explore some of the roles women have taken up over the years, and reveal how much of a constant and important presence they've been."

In March 2009 the first women in the hospital's history were admitted as In-Pensioners: Dorothy Hughes, 85, and Winifred Phillips, 82.

Winifred, who died last year, trained as a nurse and joined the Auxiliary Territorial Service in 1948 and enlisted in the Women's Royal Army Corps in 1949 while serving in Egypt. For the next 22 years she served in Singapore, Cyprus and Egypt, reaching the rank of Warrant Officer Class 2. She wrote two books about becoming one of the first female Chelsea Pensioners: My Journey to Becoming the First Lady Chelsea Pensioner (2010), and Mum's Army: Love and Adventure from the NAAFI to Citty Street (2013). She never married.

Dorothy joined the British Army in 1941, later working as part of 450 Heavy Anti Aircraft Battery in the London Division. In 1945 the battery was deployed near Dover to defend against V-1 flying bomb attacks. She later worked with the Army Operational Research Group developing fuses in shells used against V-2 rockets and was discharged from the Army in 1946 with the rank of sergeant.

The records at Royal Hospital show that another woman, a Mrs Christian Davies, was admitted to Chelsea Hospital around 1717, and was awarded a pension for her service in the Army and the wounds she received in the service of the King. She died in 1739 and was buried in the Royal Hospital grounds with full military honours.

Tight security expected when Queen reopens Army museum

TIGHT security is expected in Chelsea this week when the Queen arrives to reopen the National Army Museum – and discover how the military inspired anti-establishment heroes including John Lennon, Mick Jagger and Jimi Hendrix.

An exhibition detailing the Army's role in influencing the youth culture of the 1960s is among a number of new installations at the renovated museum, on Royal Hospital Road, which the Queen, accompanied by the Duke of Edinburgh, will open on Thursday (March 16).

"The British Army, traditionally a pillar of authority, provided a wealth of inspiration for the anti-establishment," said a museum spokesman.

"In the Sixties, style and appearance were among the most important elements in recognising subcultural identities. Young people reworked cultural symbols, styles and devices from the past to create a new look. Their attitude absorbed the cultural politics and etiquette of a bygone era but at the same time expressed a deep irreverence for and disengagement from it.

"Symbols relating to the Army – a pillar of British authority and traditional masculinity – proved particularly rich pickings. Mixing military motifs with fragments borrowed from pop culture conferred an anti-establishment standpoint to the group.

"Starting off in 1964 as a fashionable stall in London's Portobello Market, I Was Lord Kitchener's Valet specialised in selling replicas of Victorian military uniforms. The boutique carefully exploited the 1960s trend for second-hand military clothing. Popular music icons such as Eric Clapton, John Lennon and Mick Jagger were photographed wearing the shop's redcoats.

"According to the artist Peter Blake, the shop also provided inspiration for the cover art on The Beatles' 1967 album Sgt Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band. Blake's design destabilised the sense of authority conferred by military attire by bringing it together with the psychedelic.

"The in-crowd that flocked to I Was Lord Kitchener's Valet in the mid-1960s sought out a new sense of belonging in what they listened to, wore and bought.

"Another notable patron of the shop was Jimi Hendrix. A former soldier himself, Hendrix was photographed many times in antique hussar uniform. Some of these iconic images show him wearing a pelisse, usually bare-chested. This subverted the style of the upright officer who would have carried a pelisse a century earlier.

"In comparison to the masculine image of the emotionally repressed soldier, Hendrix's style was overtly flamboyant. His foppish adoption of the military jacket created a new type of vulnerable masculinity."

Why Labour won't back Tories on tax-rise plan

ON the same day that Philip Hammond announced the government's Spring Budget, Kensington and Chelsea council met to debate its budget for 2017-2018. And the main question it faced from Labour group councillors was "How can you justify raising our council taxes when council reserves are currently £209 million – that is 57 per cent of our running costs – and this year's adult social care budget is underspent by £1.9 million?"

Throughout the debate, cabinet members refused to answer this key question.

In my opening speech and refusing to support the proposed budget, I stated that Labour councillors were voting against the proposal to raise the council tax of residents because:

Firstly, the council still has obscenely high levels of reserves and has systematically and deliberately created underspends which this year render any increase in council tax completely unnecessary.

Secondly, whereas virtually every other local authority has an immediate, current funding crisis with its adult social services budget, Kensington and Chelsea does not, and, indeed, has an underspend of £1.9 million in its 2016-17 adult services budget.

This council does not have the same excuse of every other authority to increase our taxes and, thirdly, the cabinet has not explained sufficiently how they intend to spend the additional money they will extract from our hard-pressed council-taxpayers.

"Therefore," I said, "until you tell us how the money is to be spent and in what year you will spend it in we will not support any increase."

I added: "Our suspicion, based on past experience, remains that this council will bring in and hoard the people's money in non-election years, such as this, only to give it back as a pre-election bribe immediately before a council election – such as next year. Only the royal borough would have the chutzpa to try to get away with bribing the electorate with its own money."

In her closing remarks, Cllr Monica Press – deputy leader of the Labour group – noted the services neighbouring Labour-controlled boroughs are still able to offer when facing the same government cuts as Kensington and Chelsea and working with far less income and reserves than this borough.

Cllr Press says: "It is a matter of choice to put underspends back into reserves or spend them on better services for residents and is unjustified when we hold such large reserves and our constituents are facing so many hardships. Council tax is a tax which disproportionately impacts on poorer families. It will raise just £1.5 million and there is just no need for this when the underspend on this year's RBKC budget is a staggering £5 million."

"It is Labour-controlled boroughs with less income and far less reserves that are leading the way in finding new solutions to balancing their budgets and in the case of Hammersmith and Fulham freezing their council taxes for a further year whilst abolishing all charges for home care for elderly and disabled people."

Man charged over 'racist messages' sent to Miller

A KNIGHTSBRIDGE man has been charged with sending racially aggravated messages directed at Brexit court campaigner Gina Miller.

Rhodri Colwyn Philipps was charged last Tuesday with sending malicious communications with racially aggravated factors, the Metropolitan Police said.

Ms Miller complained of receiving a series of racist messages following her decision to spearhead the legal challenge, which resulted in a historic Supreme Court defeat for the government over Brexit in January.

She became the face of the first successful legal battle against Brexit but said in a radio interview that it had resulted in her becoming "apparently the most hated woman in Britain".

Philipps was arrested by officers from the Met's Operation Falcon on January 25 after a complaint was received concerning alleged threats made online against a 51-year-old woman.

He has been bailed to appear at Westminster Magistrates' Court on 4 April.

Be our secret weapon in war on terror, urge police

BY GEOFF BAKER

geoff@londonweeklynnews.co.uk

AN army of informants are reporting suspected terrorists to Scotland Yard and MI5 at the rate of 60 every day – but the security services say they need many more terror tipsters if London is to stay safe.

Counter-terrorism chiefs are appealing to Londoners to be their secret weapon in the fight against Islamist extremists and they say “don’t be shy” and about reaching for the phone but “go with your gut” to report shady characters.

“With the terror threat becoming increasingly complex and varied, we are calling on communities to act on their instincts to help prevent atrocities taking place,” said a Scotland Yard spokesman.

The appeal for more informants from the public came from the UK’s most senior counter terrorism officer, Met Police Assistant Commissioner Mark Rowley.

Launching the new Action Counters Terrorism, or ACT, campaign, Mr Rowley said information from the public continues to play a significant part in recent successes in countering terrorism. But he said officers need even more information to help build better intelligence pictures on individuals or groups plotting attacks.

“This comes as the threat, which remains at ‘severe’ – meaning an attack is highly likely – continues to diversify and expand,” said the spokesman. “This is seen in cases where terrorists have been able to reach across the world to radicalise often vulnerable, volatile or chaotic individuals and groups, and inspire and direct them using instant and secure communications.”

Commander Simon Bray, lead for the Met Police security and specialist operations unit, said: “Met officers, along with the rest of the counter-terrorism network, are working tirelessly to keep the public safe. However, advances in technology make it more complex and challenging for us to spot would-be terrorists, with radicalisation taking place in a relatively short space of time using encrypted communications.

“Everyone has seen the impact of low-technical-level attacks on crowded places in other cities across the world, making it even more important that we all remain vigilant and people act, by calling us confidentially, if they are concerned about any suspicious activity.”

Last year a record number of people contacted the confidential Anti-Terrorist Hotline, with the service receiving more than 22,000 calls. Officers hope this number will continue to increase if more can be done to encourage people to call or report online.

Commander Bray said: “Here in London we have excellent relations with our communities. These are the people who we depend on for information to help us keep Londoners safe. The number of calls and online reports we receive with information is increasing but we are appealing for even more.”

Police research to support the ACT campaign discovered that a quarter of people said they might not report their suspicions because of fears over wasting police time.

Commander Bray said: “Research has shown some people worry they might be wasting our time or they are not sure what sort of activity might be suspicious. So we want to allay those concerns and help them to help us make nothing happen by acting on their instincts.”

His call was backed by the mayor of London, Sadiq Khan, who said: “As the face of terrorism continues to change and develop, the public plays an increasingly vital part in the ongoing fight against it. We know their information makes a real difference, so I urge Londoners to keep their eyes and ears open and immediately report anything suspicious to the police.”

More details on what to look out for and how to contact police are available at gov.uk/act or call police confidentially on 0800 789 321.

Rough sleeper given five years’ jail for rape

A ROUGH sleeper who raped a young woman in Holland Park has been jailed for five years.

After a trial at Southwark Crown Court, Ismael Ali Omer, 32, of no fixed abode, was found guilty of rape. The victim – aged in her 20s – was raped by Omer early in the morning of August 27 last year in Holland Park Avenue.

Omer, who had been sleeping rough in the area, met the victim around an hour before the attack, as she was walking home from a night out.

She ran from the area after the attack, alerting members of the public. Police were called to the location, and Omer was arrested near the scene.

Detective Constable Anthony Stanton, of the Met’s Sexual Offences Exploitation and Child Abuse Command, said: “I would like to thank the victim and acknowledge her courage throughout this investigation. The strength of evidence against Omer was overwhelming which led to him being convicted of rape.

“The sentence handed to him reflects the gravity of the offence and the effect it has had on the victim’s life.”

Detective Inspector Ash Hornsby, of the Sexual Offences Exploitation and Child Abuse Command, said: “This was a violent assault on a lone female and that is reflected in the sentence. Londoners should feel safer as a dangerous offender has been taken off the streets.

“We have teams of specialist officers ready to help anyone who has been sexually assaulted but I want to reassure the public that such attacks by strangers are rare. I would encourage victims to come forward in the knowledge that we will support them.”

Safety risk to young due to cuts in services, claims AM

THE safety of young Londoners will be put at risk unless Sadiq Khan finds extra cash for youth services, a city leader has warned.

London Assembly Member Sian Berry says the future of youth services in London looks “increasingly bleak” as her research shows at least £7.5 million will be cut this year from council budgets across the capital.

Figures from almost every council have now been sent back in response to Ms Berry’s request for information.

The updated figures in her new report show:

- Total youth-service cuts across London between 2011-12 and 2016-17 are now more than £28 million – an average of 34 per cent;
- Councils plan to remove at least another £7.5 million from youth services in their upcoming 2017-18 budgets;
- At least 457 youth-worker jobs have been lost since 2011 – a staffing cut of 48 per cent;
- Some 36 youth centres have closed across the city.

A spokesman for Ms Berry said: “In a Green group budget amendment for the GLA, Sian proposed that the mayor should help ease the effects of these cuts with new funding to councils via the London Crime Prevention Fund but her proposals were rejected by the Assembly and not taken up by the mayor in his final budget in February.

“She has now repeated her call for the mayor to act at a strategic, Londonwide level to protect youth services in her response to the mayor’s draft Police and Crime Plan.”

Sian Berry

Ms Berry said: “I was very disappointed that, in my final budget in February, the mayor did not take up my proposal to help councils that have been forced to cut their services for young people.

“The risk to real crime prevention and the risk to the safety of young Londoners is clear and I believe the mayor does have a duty to act on this at a Londonwide level.

“I have been visiting communities and young people around London who are worried about the future of their services and witnessing first hand how they are losing their youth workers and youth centres.

“The final Police and Crime Plan must set out how the mayor will act to help young Londoners and mitigate the effects of these cuts.”

'Mayor must act over abuse by spy police'

BY GEOFF BAKER

geoff@londonweeklynews.co.uk

LONDON leader Sian Berry is calling for an end to operations by "unaccountable spy cops".

Ms Berry, the Green member of the London Assembly, wants Sadiq Khan to order a crackdown on what she claims is "abuse by undercover police operations".

Her call forms part of her response, on behalf of the Green group in the London Assembly, to the draft of the new Police and Crime Plan published by the mayor in December.

"Sian's demand follows a number of cases where undercover police officers were found to have got involved in relationships with campaigners, and where politicians and campaigners – including Sian – have been found on police databases, despite having no criminal record or links to crime," said a spokesman for Ms Berry.

The issues are now being investigated in a public inquiry by Lord Justice Pitchford – but the process is expected to last several more years.

Ms Berry said: "The mayor should not wait for the end of the Pitchford Inquiry before he acts on this. We need him to say now how he will sort out the problems caused by spy cops. I have been shocked by the heartbreaking stories of their abuse of personal relationships and even I appear to have been monitored by police.

"Campaigners need more assurance from the new mayor and commissioner that abuses will stop. This must include clear new processes for governance and accountability in the new Police and Crime Plan.

"For policing to work, Londoners must be able to trust officers and know that they can be held responsible for wrongdoing. The police cannot be allowed to operate outside the law."

The Assembly Member's recommendations for improvement to the final Police and Crime Plan, which will be published by the mayor later this spring, are based on visits to community groups and campaigners across London.

Ms Berry's recommendations for the new Police and Crime Plan include:

- Fundamentally reform how undercover police are managed and held accountable, and do more to improve officer confidence in whistle-blowing processes within the service;

- Push hard for the devolution of more aspects of criminal justice to show victims and the wider community more consistency in prosecutions;

- Invest in youth work for real crime prevention and to help young Londoners thrive;
- Adopt a more evidence-based and consistent approach to education about knife crime and violence;

- Improve on plans for more local policing by doing more to support ward panels and community groups such as neighbourhood watch;

- Task ward officers with helping residents avoid scams and fraud carried out online, and investigating these crimes where they have a local connection;

- Fully fund the implementation of the Violence Against Women and Girls Strategy, and protect specialist services for diverse groups of women;

- Improve training for officers who deal with the public to help people with mental health problems and dementia;

- Take more positive action to improve diversity in the MPS more quickly, in particular for the new Police Now graduates and direct-entry inspector and superintendent scheme;

- Address inequalities in how different groups are treated by the police, with a particular focus on winning back the confidence of young BAME Londoners.

City council marks St David's Day – for one hour

ALTHOUGH the Irish get an entire all-song-and-dancing St Patrick's Day Parade, Westminster's Welsh were given only an hour of official celebration this month to mark their national day and salute the milkmaids from the valleys on whom the capital once depended.

But at least Westminster City Council made the effort and council Leader Nickie Aiken and Cllr Jason Williams defied the rain, wind and cold to clamber to the top of City Hall to raise the Welsh flag to celebrate St David's Day on March 1.

"The flag was flown for one hour in a symbolic gesture to recognise the enormous contribution that Welsh people have made to Westminster and the United Kingdom. Both Cllrs Aiken and Williams are originally from Wales," said a council spokesman.

"Links between Wales and Westminster go back for centuries – but in modern times, notable Welsh contributions to Westminster life has come from across the worlds of fashion, politics, culture and entertainment.

"A green plaque now marks where fashion giant Laura Ashley began hand-printing textiles in her Pimlico flat. Mary Quant is synonymous with Carnaby Street and the Swinging Sixties and Ivor Novello's lavish West End musicals were the smash hits of their day.

"One key area that the Welsh really made a mark in Westminster was the drapery trade. Drapers' assistants from Wales were numerous among the clothing and textile shops of Oxford Street, Queensway and Westbourne Grove. Several were successful enough to be among the first proprietors of large department stores, most notably DH Evans, now House of Fraser on Oxford Street, who was originally from Carmarthenshire."

Cllr Aiken said: "As a proud Welshwoman, I am thrilled that we have been able to celebrate St David's Day and to fly the flags of Wales and the Union together. But I also take enormous pride in the community of which we are all part in Westminster.

"Like so many others, I have moved to the city and made it my home, where the combination of all our different backgrounds and experiences bring unrivalled vibrancy to our distinct neighbourhoods, making it a true city for all."

Council leader Nickie Aiken and Cllr Jason Williams raise the Welsh flag at Westminster City Hall

One key area that the Welsh really made a mark in Westminster was in the dairy industry. A print from a Cries Of London series of 1804 describes contemporary milk-carriers as "almost universally Welsh girls, whose uncommon strength and hardness of constitution peculiarly fit them for an employment of such great labour and constant exposure to the inclemencies of the weather".

Further evidence of their prevalence is found in the numerous common Welsh surnames appearing as cow-keepers and dairymen in London trade directories. It has been suggested that it was Welsh families with farming backgrounds who were prepared to accept the very long hours and small returns offered by small retail dairy outlets.

On a ceremonial and official note, Westminster is also home to the Prince of Wales' official London residence Clarence House, and the government's Welsh Office is based at Gwydyr House.

The Welsh Guards are one of the five regiments of Foot Guards in the Household Division who provide the Queen's Guard at Buckingham Palace.

Colm, 15, is technology king

SHEPHERD'S Bush resident and Portland Place School pupil Colm Urquhart led his team to victory during a regional technology tournament.

Colm, 15, and his team of three other pupils from the independent school in Marylebone went up against many worthy challengers in the one-day event. Hosted by the Rotary Club of Great Britain, which supports STEM – science, technology, engineering and mathematics – education, the competition aimed to enhance pupils' engagement with design and technology outside the classroom.

The teams were challenged with devising a solution to a technical task. Leading the Year 10 group, GCSE product-design pupil Colm excelled during the competition, with his team winning gold for the KS4 category. The Year 12 and Year 13 group just missed out on first place in the KS5 category by a few points, losing to South Hampstead High School.

On the day, the teams were tasked with creating a moving vehicle which could travel along a guttering pipe, scooping debris out of the way. The teams set to work and had approximately three hours to design their product, make a portfolio of ideas, manufacture it and present.

One of the criteria was that the vehicle had to be decorated with the logo of a chosen charity. All teams designed bright, vibrant vehicles for a range of charities. Additionally, the KS4 and KS5 teams were required to create a working switch which enabled their vehicle to be set into reverse.

To get to the tournament, Portland Place pupils had to succeed in another competition within their own school. To earn a place, 16 pupils had to design and make a method for picking up and moving an egg over a 6in hurdle without it breaking. The innovative task provided excitement for the 3D design students in the sixth form who watched and judged the final presentations.

Colm said: "It is so exciting to have won this tech tournament. We worked really hard to make sure we created a working prototype and put into practice our STEM knowledge."

Portland Place design and technology teacher Sarah Birtles said: "Colm is a very passionate and intelligent young man who played an incredibly strong role in the tournament."

"We are so pleased to have a winning team. It was great to see the students competing, and putting all their STEM knowledge into a practical, engineering-based activity. The challenges were hard but the students all created excellent solutions which incorporated a range of skills."

Mum urges Tories to ensure teachers can save children's lives

BY JACK DIXON
jack@londonweeklynews.co.uk

A MOTHER from Shepherd's Bush whose daughter suffered a life-threatening medical episode at school has urged ministers to make sure teachers are equipped to help children with long-term conditions.

Louise Fyfe-Taylor wants the government to ensure schools have policies in place to guide staff when dealing with children who have illnesses such as type 1 diabetes, asthma or epilepsy.

She started her campaign after her daughter Jenny suffered a severe hypoglycaemic episode while she was taking part in a school cycling lesson.

The incident left her blood glucose levels dangerously low and it took 40 minutes for her to recover.

Louise says members of staff were unsure how to help Jenny and had not checked that she had her test kit with her.

Since 2014, all schools in England have been required by law to have a medical-conditions policy in place to assist teaching staff in life-threatening situations.

But Louise says some schools are not aware of the law or what they need to do to meet their legal responsibilities. "I've spent the last few weeks asking other schools in my area what support they offer," she said.

Louise Fyfe-Taylor with Hammersmith MP Andy Slaughter

"Disappointingly, no schools I spoke to had a long-term medical-conditions policy in place. In England this is actually a breach of the law – but more importantly it risks children's lives.

"This serious threat to my daughter's health could have been avoided if a medical-conditions policy had been in place and was being properly followed."

Last week Louise shared her experience with MPs as part of a research project by the all-party parliamentary groups on diabetes and epilepsy. She has also set up a petition calling for Ofsted – the schools regulator – to start routinely checking schools to make sure they have medical-conditions policies in place.

The petition, which has already been signed by more than 7,000 people, also urges Edward Timpson MP, the government minister for vulnerable children and families, to remind schools of their responsibilities.

Louise said: "I want the minister to write to every school in England to remind them that they have a legal responsibility to have a medical-conditions policy. And to make sure that these policies are actually being followed, he should ask school regulator Ofsted to look at this during their inspections.

"Making sure schools get this right will help children with serious medical conditions thrive in school and could save a life."

Leaping into literature

A MANAGEMENT consultant from Hammersmith has made the leap into literature after being inspired by the challenges of caring for his elderly mother.

Mark Carrington, pictured, hits the shelves of London's bookshops for the first time this month with his debut, Peaceful Breeze. The book is one man's account of the difficulties of providing care for his mother during her final days.

Mark's mother was suddenly diagnosed with advanced colon cancer in 2014 – and the condition quickly became terminal.

As a son, he felt a responsibility to care for her and to make sure she was as comfortable as possible. But Mark had to overcome problematic red tape put up by the healthcare industry without any practical guidance about how to maintain a normal daily life while going through the emotional toil of losing his mother.

The book recounts Mark's entire journey as a carer, while reflecting on the life of the woman who raised him.

He said: "Despite the best intentions of doctors and nurses around me, the harsh reality is that if I had not been there to advocate throughout her illness, my mother very likely could have fallen through the gaps in a system that is already overloaded with patients.

"With the advances in medicine increasing the longevity of life and the rapidly growing population of seniors who will need medical care, this discussion is becoming even more vital."

Mark, 54, said his experience had inspired him to add to his three masters degrees by studying for a PhD in palliative care.

Renting in Fulham twice as dear as in Greenwich

BY JACK DIXON
jack@londonweeklynews.co.uk

THE cost of renting in London is now so high that a family of four in Hammersmith and Fulham would need an annual income of more than £100,000 just to pay for basic living space, according to new research.

Estate agents' statistics reveal that the borough is among the least affordable for renters, with cash-strapped families needing to find six-figure sums every year in order to pay their bills.

The study by online property service Nested found that the rental value of living space in Hammersmith and Fulham is now £32.86 per square metre.

It used the data to calculate that the annual cost for a family of four to have the minimum recommended amount of space would be an eye-watering £100,619.64.

For a person to live on their own in the borough, they would need to fork out more than £53,000 a year to cover rent and additional living costs.

The study also revealed that the cost of renting in Hammersmith and Fulham was almost twice as expensive as desirable South London boroughs, such as Lewisham and Greenwich – and nearly three times dearer than Bexley, the capital's cheapest area for renters.

According to Nested's rental affordability index, Hammersmith and Fulham ranks as the fifth-most-expensive borough in London, only behind Camden and the super-rich hotspots of Kensington and Chelsea, the City of Westminster and the City of London.

The index investigated the price of renting per square metre in 33 London boroughs, 15 UK cities and 72 cities around the world.

A spokesman for the property specialist said the comprehensive study was undertaken in order to understand the costs associated with renting as an individual and as a family, and to "determine whether cities are becoming increasingly unaffordable".

According to the index, the average Londoner must now earn a gross salary of at least £3,323.07 a month to be able to afford to live alone in the capital. That equates to a gross salary of £39,876.84 a year.

Outside London, the UK's most expensive place to rent is Edinburgh, where the cost per square metre is £12.85, requiring one person to earn £20,737 a year.

The wealthiest parts of London are even more expensive than some of the world's richest cities, with San Francisco, New York City and Hong Kong all lagging behind.

Duchess opens 'state-of-the-art' nursery

BY GEOFF BAKER
geoff@londonweeklynews.co.uk

THE Duchess of Gloucester has officially opened the new nursery building at St Anne's and Avondale Park Nursery School in Notting Hill.

Following the federation of Avondale Park Primary School and St Anne's Nursery School, a £2 million construction programme, funded by the Kensington and Chelsea council, began in late 2015 to build a new building for 100 children on Avondale Park Primary School's spacious Sirdar Road site.

During her visit, Her Royal Highness met the children and staff, toured nursery classrooms, listened to a performance from the school choir and unveiled a commemorative plaque.

The Duchess said: "The Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea can be truly proud of the opportunities available here.

"I wish everyone who comes to this nursery, whether to teach or to learn, all the very best."

Cllr Emma Will, the royal borough's cabinet member for education, said: "We are greatly honoured that Her Royal Highness has visited us to see the new state-of-the-art nursery and facilities which will provide an outstanding learning environment for pupils.

"We want all of our children to have the very best start in life and our continued investment ensures that schools in Kensington and Chelsea are among the best in the country."

Katy Blackler, executive head teacher at St Anne's and Avondale Park Nursery School, said: "We are thrilled that HRH The Duchess of Gloucester was able to officially open our stunning new building.

"Our vision of creating the best possible nursery provision with the best possible teaching for our youngest children has come to fruition. We look forward to future generations making the most of all that it has to offer."

Highlights of the new building include two new teaching spaces, a new nursery entrance, as well as improvements to the existing two classrooms and outdoor areas.

Building works were completed in August 2016, in time for the first children to arrive that September. Following a new intake in January the nursery now has more than 90 children.

Hiba is named youth mayor

HIBA Al Moosawi has been elected the new youth mayor for Hammersmith and Fulham after picking up almost 2,000 votes in a record turnout.

The 14-year-old, who attends Fulham Cross Girls' School, said she is looking forward to the challenge and hopes to open up work-experience opportunities for teenagers.

Hiba is pictured with Adam Elbounabi, who was voted in as the borough's new Member of Youth Parliament during last month's elections.

Adam, 17, of the Burlington Danes Academy, said he wants to focus on tackling discrimination.

Gun-toting Queen Mum would nonsense from Nazi invaders

Geoff Baker
on how plucky
Elizabeth was ready to take on Hitler's forces

As the BBC's adaptation of Len Deighton's SS-GB grips millions with its imagined nightmare story of London living under the Nazi jackboot, many are asking what would have happened to the Royal Family if Hitler had successfully invaded.

One answer is that it seems that the Queen – the late Queen Mother – would have gone down fighting, her gun blazing.

In the television drama, Queen Elizabeth, Princess Elizabeth and Princess Margaret are whisked away to the safety of Canada while the King is imprisoned in the Tower of London.

But in reality, it could have been much different as the brave and plucky Queen not only refused to leave but she was prepared to battle it out against any German invaders herself.

Hitler's invasion plans for Britain included the launch of commando raids on Buckingham Palace and Windsor Castle in which crack troops either landed by glider or parachuted on to the grounds to seize the Royal Family and hold them hostage in a bid to try force Winston Churchill's surrender.

But Queen Elizabeth was having none of that and in a bid to protect herself and her daughters from the much-feared invaders, she armed herself with a revolver and took to target practice in the grounds of the palace, shooting the closest things that London had to Nazis at the time – the palace rats.

Hitler is said to have called her “the most dangerous woman in Europe” because he viewed Elizabeth's popularity as a threat to German into leave London and send the princesses to Canada but Queen Elizabeth refused.

In a famous declaration that the Royal Family would not flee its imperilled people, she told worried ministers: “The children won't go without me. I won't leave the King. And the King will never leave.”

Although the princesses were billeted at Windsor for their safety and security, and the King and Queen would go there too at weekends, in the week they would be back at the palace, visibly in the thick of it – with the Queen travelling around London in an armoured car – and so that she could get in some sharp-shooting practice.

The Queen's pluck was revealed by her former lady-in-waiting, the current Queen's cousin the late Margaret Rhodes.

She said her aunt had feared parachutists dropping into the grounds and kidnapping her and her children and so she took to using a revolver, practising on the numerous rats which had been scared out of their holes by the German bombing.

“Queen Elizabeth did learn how to shoot a pistol in the gardens of Buckingham Palace,” Mrs Rhodes revealed.

“I suppose quite rightly, she thought if parachutists came down and whisked them away somewhere, she could at least take a parachutist or two with her.”

Mrs Rhodes also stayed at Windsor Castle for a period of the war and she witnessed an occasion which indicated that if an invasion did come then the King had no intention either of being seized without a fight.

“I did live quite a long time at Windsor and it was lovely. The King and Queen were being marvellous and really working like slaves,” she said.

“Every day they'd go off to tour different parts of the country which had been bombed and they came back to spend the weekend with the girls, who were permanently at Windsor.”

In moments of danger the head page would deliver a message to the family with a coded colour, letting the King know how close the bombers were.

“I do remember one night we three girls were woken up and taken to the King and Queen's rooms, where I remember the King opening a bedside cabinet and taking out a revolver,” she said.

“And then we all processed very slowly, because Queen Elizabeth refused to be hurried, we were down in subterranean corridors for what seemed like miles and eventually got to the shelter.”

But, like much of London, Buckingham Palace did not escape the Blitz and on September 13 1940 the Luftwaffe very nearly succeeded in killing the King and Queen during an air raid.

The incident was described by Queen Elizabeth in a letter to her mother-in-law Queen Mary. She recorded how she was “battling” to remove an eyelash from the King's eye, when they heard the “unmistakable whirr-whirr of a German plane” and then the “scream of a bomb”.

She added: “It all happened so quickly that we had only time to look foolishly at each other when the scream hurtled past us and exploded with a tremendous crash in the quadrangle.”

While her “knees trembled a little bit”, she was “so pleased with the behaviour of our servants”, some of whom were injured as one bomb crashed through a glass roof and another pulverised the palace chapel.

Hours later, after lunching in their air-raid shelter, she and the King were visiting West Ham.

She wrote: “I felt as if I was walking in a dead city... all the houses evacuated, and yet through the broken windows one saw all the poor little possessions, photographs, beds, just as they were left.”

Although the King and Queen did much to raise morale by standing their ground and refusing to flee, documents uncovered last year reveal that there was a top-secret plan to get them away from London if the threat of the Nazi invasion became too severe.

The documents reveal that King George personally co-ordinated the mission, codenamed Operation Rocking Horse, which called for the creation of a personal bodyguard, consisting of 200 trusted members of the elite Coldstream Guards and troopers from the XII Royal Lancers, whose sole job was to guard the King, Queen Elizabeth and their daughters.

The Lancers were given the main role. Supplied with specially adapted Daimler, Guy and Rolls-Royce armoured cars, they were tasked with preparing to get the Royal Family away from Buckingham Palace or Windsor Castle to one of four remote country houses that had been prepared as secret hideaways. Their orders made it clear they were expected to fight their way through any cordon of German troops.

The hidden archives were uncovered in Windsor Castle by historian Dr Andrew Stewart, of King's College London, who has detailed them in his book, The King's Private Army.

Under Operation Rocking Horse, the Royal Family would have been smuggled from Buckingham Palace to Madresfield Court, a 12th-century mansion in Worcestershire – chosen as a bolthole as the property was owned by friends of former Coldstream officers and because the nearby River Severn offered an escape route if their cover was blown.

Dr Stewart said: “According to German sources, Hitler devised a plan for bombers to launch a dive-bomb attack on Central London. Then paratroopers, dropped from low-flying aircraft, would land in the grounds of Buckingham Palace and capture any members of the Royal Family they could find.

“Great emphasis was placed upon the German ‘Royal Unit’ taking its hostages alive as Hitler apparently have taken no in real SS-GB

During the war, Queen Elizabeth travelled around London in an armoured car

Philipp Kadelbach, director of the BBC TV version of SS-GB believed that capturing the King and his immediate family could force Britain's surrender.

"Fears that such an operation would be mounted led to the King's private army, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel James Coats.

"No written orders were given and, such was the sense of urgency surrounding the security of the Royal Family, his troops were often on only five minutes' notice to move. The destinations were only ever referred to by codewords contained in sealed envelopes."

In the event of the Royal Family being smuggled to Madresfield Court, the house would have been defended by troops from the King's private army and auxiliary units made up of local farmers trained to assassinate Germans and blow up vehicles.

"In the worst case and with it looking like the secret location was jeopardised, the two princesses were to be taken out of the country to ensure their safety," said Dr Stewart.

Although the idea of the then-Queen shooting at Nazi invaders may seem fanciful to some, the Germany-born director of the BBC's SS-GB, Philipp Kadelbach, says it is important that the Nazi story is constantly retold.

"Of course, it is unsettling to see Nazi iconography everywhere. But it was the most horrific time, and it is vital that we keep telling this story," he said.

"It is always worth telling. There can't be enough of these shows, even if we sometimes seem flooded by them.

"It's crucial that younger generations keep hearing this story. Even if people seem tired of it, we need to tell it over and over again. It must never happen again."

The television drama's producer Sally Woodward Gentle agrees.

"It's a thriller set against the backdrop of what might have happened. But it should also make us ponder. It's really chilling and you realise that we were incredibly lucky that we weren't occupied," she said.

"It really chimes with today's world. Recent politics have made it feel more pertinent than ever.

"The message in this drama is that you can never be complacent. It's not enough to maintain the status quo. You have to stand up and do something."

Just like the Queen Mum.

The Royal Family would have been smuggled from Buckingham Palace to Madresfield Court, in Worcestershire, if the threat of Nazi invasion had become too severe

Plans for North Kensington Library have sparked protests

Library row

I NOTE with some interest Nick Paget-Brown's indignation about a suggestion apparently made by an opposition councillor some weeks ago that the case of North Kensington Library amounts to class warfare.

Our esteemed council leader found such a suggestion so preposterous that instead of answering the actual arguments that campaigners had raised, he instead used the space that this paper gives to him to list the ways in which class warfare is not, in his view, being waged in the borough.

As a strategy, it's classic Paget-Brown – go into semantics and construct an argument based on what words might mean rather than deal with the actual issue.

For a few months, for example, his public commentary on our campaign was based on a faulty assumption he made when he heard the word "library".

He insisted that what the campaign meant when we said "Save North Kensington Library building for public use" was that we thought library services were being shut in the borough. See his blogging on the matter, where patient members of the community take him through the whole sentence and what the word "building" might mean in that formulation: <https://rbkcleadersblog.wordpress.com/2016/05/20/claims-of-asset-stripping-are-junk>. So far, so little actual comprehension of the issue.

His latest wheeze, to get all hot under the collar about whether this is class war or not, is all the more irritating because he was the originator of the idea that the whole issue is class warfare and not anyone associated with the campaign, or its supporters.

So not only does he fail in his column to address any of the campaign's arguments or demands, he is also refuting an argument that was originally his: during the full council "debate" of our petition (which did not directly address any of the four demands on the petition), Cllr Paget-Brown accused the campaign of "crude class warfare".

Can I suggest that Cllr Paget-Brown finds the suggestion that the council's actions amount to class warfare so offensive, he should not be invoking class warfare in relation to the situation in the first place.

Interested readers can see a clip of Cllr Paget-Brown making this assertion before anyone else did on our campaign video at: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LjA20oSahSY>.

Of course, our campaign see why Cllr Paget-Brown might want to make rhetorical points: he hasn't got an actual argument for any of the concerns, questions, and issues raised by the decision at North Kensington Library.

The decision was undemocratic; the council made no serious attempt to consider the use of the building beyond giving it to a private business venture; the councillor responsible was seemingly compromised by possible personal interests; the financial arguments do not add up; the loss of the building will mean a reduction in library services; the whole scheme is an £11 million investment in the expansion of private education, which should really be financing itself; especially if we are to protect frontline services.

Here's a guaranteed fundraiser – why don't we all take bets that Cllr Paget-Brown won't engage with the substance of the issue because he'll be too busy arguing that what I meant by substance was that I'll be taking a stand in a subway, or similar?

Terror attacks

WHEN I heard the news that British holidaymakers had been killed in a suspected terrorist attack in Sousse, on June 26 2015, I – like so many of us – was shocked.

The attack in which the overwhelming majority of victims – 30 out of 38 people killed and 17 out of 34 injured – were British was an attack on our nation. They were parents, grandparents, children, siblings and partners, just like us.

It required a major British operation to ensure that the victims, survivors and their families received the support they needed and that the most comprehensive evidence possible was gathered, to help understand exactly what had happened. The British police, with our unique experience and expertise, had a central role to play in this.

My command worked with police forces and partners around the UK to launch a huge policing response.

Following the attack, officers flew out to Sousse, where they quickly developed a working relationship with the Tunisian authorities, so that they could keep families in the UK informed about the Tunisian authorities' investigation.

Back in the UK, a team of more than 100 specialist family liaison officers from 16 UK police forces were assigned to support more than 300 family members affected by the tragedy. They provided them with guidance on what was happening in Tunisia and ensured that relatives were given access to agencies including the NHS, Victim Support, the Red Cross, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority and the Coroners' Witness Service.

They also provided support to the survivors in the lead-up to the inquest, at which some were to bravely provide personal accounts of what happened to them and their loved ones.

Meanwhile, a team of my officers travelled to airports across the UK where they spoke to more than 2,000 people returning from Tunisia – all were potential witnesses to the attack whose statements could crucially assist in understanding what had happened.

Met Police officers in Sousse used specialist technology to create a detailed digital reconstruction of the area, the movements of the attacker and those who died and were injured.

This was a task that involved a week of capturing images in Sousse and months of development afterwards, and enabled us to present to the coroner and the families a detailed and accurate depiction of the scene at the inquests, so that we could all better understand what happened that day.

Our duty to the victims and their families continued when the inquests opened at the Royal Courts of Justice in London.

It wasn't going to be possible for all the families of those who died to attend the hearings, and we helped the coroner's office to set up and manage a number of satellite courts across the UK at which families could watch live footage of the inquests.

The impact of the terrorist attack in Sousse was felt by the whole nation but none more so than the survivors and the families and friends of those who died.

As a police officer, I have been determined to ensure that we do the best we can for them.

As a father and a husband, I have been humbled by their sheer courage and dignity in the face of such incomprehensible tragedy.

Mental health

THE government is proposing changes to Personal Independence Payment, which is gradually replacing Disability Living Allowance. PIP is awarded to cover the extra costs that disabled people face.

In December, courts ruled that people who find it difficult to leave the house because of anxiety, panic attacks, and other mental health problems should be able to receive the higher rate of PIP.

On Thursday (February 23), the government brought forward legislation that would stop the court's judgement from coming into effect. These changes would mean that thousands of people who experience psychological distress when planning or following journeys are only eligible for a lower rate of PIP.

People who find it difficult to leave the house because of anxiety, panic attacks and other mental health problems are as restricted in their independence as many people with physical mobility problems, and face just as many higher costs in their daily lives as other disabled people do.

The government's changes to Personal Independence Payment (PIP) would affect over 160,000 people with mental health problems - both in and out of work - who have extra costs related to their disability.

These proposed changes could prevent people accessing the financial support they need to get to health or job appointments, get out to pay for fuel and heating, take their children to school or see friends and family - things essential to their daily lives and recovery, things essential to preventing isolation.

The government says that it is committed to treating mental health as seriously as physical health, but these proposals call this commitment into question. These misguided proposals must be reversed.

Mind is fighting hard to try to make sure the benefits system works for people with mental health problems. This includes highlighting the negative impact of sanctions, trying to get this damaging change to PIP reversed, and campaigning against the proposed £30 a week cut to the work related activity group (WRAG) of the out-of-work disability benefit Employment and Support Allowance (ESA).

Our legal team is also looking into a possible legal challenge if this legislation comes into force.

Rough sleeping

ROUGH sleeping in the capital has doubled over the last five years - this is beyond shameful in one of the world's richest cities.

It is unacceptable that for years some of London's most vulnerable people have been failed by the system.

Rough sleepers are at serious risk every night they spend on the streets and new funding will help reduce the dangers they face and improve their quality of life.

I'm determined to do everything in my power to address this issue - but while these projects will have a positive impact, rough sleeping will clearly not be solved overnight.

Government at all levels needs to work with the capital's fantastic charities, not only to support those who find themselves sleeping on the streets, but also to prevent people from becoming homeless in the first place.

Fire safety

THE Government has published its response to my petition calling for a recall of the several million tumble dryers manufactured by Whirlpool companies, including Hotpoint and Indesit, which are liable to catch fire.

It is wholly inadequate and makes it more urgent that the petition gains another 40,000 signatures to take it to the 100,000 that ensures a full parliamentary debate.

In August last year, a fire ripped through a flat in Shepherd's Bush. Following an investigation by the London Fire Brigade, it was confirmed that the fire was caused by a faulty Whirlpool tumble dryer.

Since then I have been campaigning for the government to force Whirlpool to recall all faulty tumble dryers.

As part of this campaign I was in correspondence with the Minister for Consumer Protection, Margot James MP, and I launched the petition to force the government to debate the issue.

I wrote my most recent letter to Margot James in December, asking her to implement a full product recall. I received her response yesterday (February 27) over two months after I wrote.

The government responded in similar terms to the petition, detailing the action taken by both them and Whirlpool to deal with this issue.

From their response, you would think the government has been actively pushing Whirlpool on this issue, resulting in the company's recent change in their advice to owners of faulty appliances.

This finally changed from saying the machines could be used under supervision to an admission that they should be put out of use entirely, as recommended by the London Fire Brigade.

However, what they fail to mention is that Whirlpool only changed their advice after the consumer group Which? began a judicial review of Peterborough Trading Standards, who then issued a warning notice.

The government also states that a working group that has been set up to investigate the issue.

However, this working group is a continuation of the previously established steering group, which took no action for over a year because it received no government support.

While the new group is better organised, it has failed to publish the interim report it promised would be available in December.

In any event, the working group already knows what needs to be done, as this was set out in the independent report by Lynn Faulds Wood published in February 2016.

Once again, the government has not told the full story on this issue and has failed to take serious action against Whirlpool.

What action has been taken has been the result of campaigning by consumer groups and individuals like Lynn Faulds Wood.

This issue needs to be debated in Parliament, and it is more vital than ever that people sign my petition to force the government to have a proper, public debate so that real action can be taken.

Green belts

Green belts have been guarding against urban sprawl for more than 60 years.

That's the main purpose of England's 14 Green belts - to protect our largest and most historic towns and cities from merging into one endless metropolis.

But the green belt means so much more to the people who use it. Covering 12.5 per cent of England, it's the local countryside for 30 million people - a place where they can stretch their legs and get closer to nature.

Almost a fifth of England's public rights of way are within green belts. That's routes such as public footpaths and bridleways, stretching over 30,000km. Green belts also have 12 per cent of the National Cycle Network.

Almost half of England's Country Parks, over a third of Woodland Trust land and Local Nature Reserves, and almost a quarter of our most historic Parks and Gardens are within green belts. Green belts also contain a third of all the new Local Nature Reserves created since 2009.

Home to a large proportion of England's deciduous woodland and other types of important and threatened wild areas known as 'Priority Habitat', green belts are also a haven for wildlife.

So green belts are already a fantastic resource - offering a home for wildlife, a place for recreation for millions of people, and environmental benefits for all of us.

But we can do better.

There are opportunities to:

■ Improve accessibility for people

■ Create better habitats for wildlife

■ Enhance environmental value

Recent polling found that connecting with nature was a priority when people were asked what they would like to see more of in the green belt. The creation of more woodland parks, more nature reserves and more educational opportunities were the most popular options.

Its permanence, protected status and proximity to those 30 million people who live nearby makes the green belt a wise place to invest.

We're calling on the Government, local authorities and others to take action to realise the full potential of this vital resource. Green belts are worth investing in

■ For our health

■ For nature's health

■ For our future

Have a whale of a time at museum's brand new exhibition

BY GEOFF BAKER
geoff@londonweeklynews.co.uk

NOW it's Moby Tom, Dick and Harry as the Natural History Museum is preparing to fill its Hintze Hall with more than 100 whales.

The specimens from the museum's research collection will be brought out from behind the scenes for the first time to show the huge diversity of whales, dolphins and porpoises at a new exhibition opening this summer.

The huge pod will go on show around the massive skeleton of a blue whale which will be taking centre stage high in the hall from July 14.

"Diving through the heart of the hall, a blue whale skeleton will become the central display, taking on the role held by our much-loved Dippy the Diplodocus cast for the last 35 years," said a spokesman.

"Visitors will be able to get up close to the variety of different species, from the vast sperm whale, the largest toothed predator on Earth that's similar in length to a double decker bus, through to the compact 1.5m-long harbour porpoise, one of the smallest cetaceans.

"You can explore their remarkable adaptations to ocean living yet how they are surprisingly much more like us than you might expect.

"Like humans, whales are sociable mammals that communicate across vast distances and adopt popular behavioural trends. Visitors will hear the sounds and songs many species use to attract potential mates and explore how their complex brains enable them to experience a range of emotions."

Richard Sabin, whale expert at the museum, said: "Whales are incredibly mysterious and complex creatures, as well as being the giants of the seas. This exhibition brings you face to face with some of the world's most impressive whale specimens, and shows how we are starting to understand and answer the biggest challenges facing whales today.

"New techniques and scientific developments are giving us the tools to use specimens, including the ones you will see, to monitor human impact, pollution and climate change. This collection is an active resource for protecting whales now and in the future."

Highlights of the exhibition will include:

- Skulls that reveal how whales sense and their eating habits, including killer whales and a pygmy right whale skull;

- Organs showing how whales breathe and digest food, including a sperm whale's stomach and a fin whale aorta;

- Flippers from a blue whale and humpback whale showing their differences in size and swimming style;

- An immersive experience where you can see how some whales, dolphins and porpoises sense their prey using sound.

Sir Michael Dixon, director of the Natural History Museum, said: "The specimens on show are part of the world's greatest resource for understanding the ecology and behaviour of whales.

"Scientists are researching our cetacean collection to uncover the mysteries of these enigmatic creatures and monitor and predict changes in their habitats. Oceans are Earth's largest natural resource but are under huge pressure from human activities such as over-fishing and pollution. We must protect our oceans for the benefit of future generations."

The Whales exhibition will kick off an extended season of events exploring the power of nature and our responsibility to protect our oceans. It will be at the museum until late 2018.

See your home in a whole new light

Spring is the perfect time to take a fresh look at your home and carry out a few improvements

They say a house is not a home until you make it your own – and spring may be the perfect moment to do just that.

Whether moving into somewhere new or sprucing up an older property, now is the time to devote a little tender loving care to the place you call home.

It may be just a roof over our heads and somewhere to bed down for the night, but the four walls in which we live say a lot about our personalities.

Freshening up a drab and lifeless garden, revamping an unused study, utility room or spare bedroom, even splashing a lick of paint on the hallway walls can lift the late-winter blues and get you feeling positive as the warmer weather rolls in.

And it's not only your mood that can benefit from a spot of DIY – just a touch of careful planning and a bit of skilful execution can add tens of thousands of pounds to the value of your home.

You might be getting round to knocking up the conservatory you've always dreamed of, tearing out and replacing your tired old kitchen or even putting a new spin on your master bedroom.

Perhaps that grotty shed at the bottom of the garden needs pulling down? That garage you've been meaning to tidy could do with a clear out? Maybe your bathroom could do with a full makeover? You may even be planning something altogether more ambitious – knocking down a wall or two, resurfacing your driveway or fitting new windows.

It might finally be time to do something with those extra rooms now that the children have flown the nest.

Spring is the perfect time to take a fresh look at your home, imagine something new and put it into practice.

With those longer days fast approaching on the calendar, you'll see your humble abode in a whole new light when you've given it the care and attention it deserves.

Exteriors

Decking can transform your outside space, but there are a few things to consider before getting stuck in

Plant and deck

Whether you have a large country garden, small town garden or compact terrace, you will want to make the most of your outdoor space this summer. So, with that in mind, design experts Richard Burbidge have come up with a few handy design hints to help you transform your space.

Before you start to build your dream decking area, there are a few things to bear in mind:

● Planning permission

The position of your decking can depend on planning permission limitations. If you don't want to go through the hassle of securing planning permission for your decking, then make sure it is no closer than 20 metres to a main road and no more than three metres in height. If your decking is raised above this height, planning permission should be sought and an outdoor balustrade should be utilised as an essential safety barrier.

● Location, location

Before designing your decking you should consider where the sun will be at different times of the day. Also, will your new deck be protected from prevailing winds, by fences, walls or buildings? Finally, will the decking interfere with any household services; in particular will it affect access to drains or vents? If so, access to these may need to be built in to the design.

● Size matters

As with any home extension, you should try to make the improvements look as though they were part of the original house. Therefore size should be taken into consideration when designing your decking. A small deck on a large house may look like an obvious addition, rather than an organic part of the house. Similarly, oversized decking on smaller houses or in compact outdoor spaces can look equally out of place. Richard Burbidge offers a wide range of decking balustrade in a variety of styles and finishes, as it is also important to choose the right balustrade to make sure they are in keeping with the overall look and feel of your garden.

● On the slopes

One of the best ways to make the most out of a garden with a slope, especially one that slopes away from the house, is to fit multi-level decking and outdoor balustrade. Not only can this add interest to the garden design and break up larger areas, it also makes uneven or sloping gardens more useable and safer.

● Online planning

To make decking design easy, Richard Burbidge offers an innovative online planning tool called Deckplanner. The free service allows you to plan your dream decking and balustrade system in just a few simple steps. Visit www.richardburbidge.com.

VANQUISH ID: THE BOSS OF HIP, PUKKA PADS.

Vanquish Iconic Developments was set up in 2011 by Mark Harris, a successful entrepreneur and part-time actor.

Vanquish ID is one of the most exciting and innovative property development companies in London today, run by CEO/Founder Mark, his two young sons and his creative team.

Mark comments: "We are a company that has a unique identity and ethos, an identity born in the creative environment that surrounds us today in Shoreditch, Soho, New York and trendy, hip and off-the-cuff cities throughout the world today. Property development should be creative, not bland, boring or 'for sale' with the same old luxury designer heading. At Vanquish Iconic we design iconic, for those that want to live, feel and be different. We really are unique in what we do. So I decided, after the 2007 recession, to throw away those high-end, branded interior designer names. So I merge the theatrical experience I have into my design nowadays. So every development I do, really is different. We actually do design everything, from the layouts of apartments right down to the kitchen sinks. We've been creating urban industrial design for many years now across South East London. We don't follow the trend, we create it. Hip, pukka pads and total off-the-wall design say it all. People ask me, "do you ever stop working?" That confuses me, as I don't work...I love what I do and I'm a firm believer that if you love what you do then you never have to work a day in your life. It is my life...my fix...Now meet my great team."

Jon Gould

Jon Gould - Jon Gould is an associate director of the firm and has the project management role. He has been with the company for 8 years and started off as a buyer, working his way up throughout the years. He now leads the construction team dealing with all sub-contractors and suppliers. Jon project manages our sites to sub-structure level, dealing with building control and warranty inspectors ensuring that all is in line before second fix contractors begin.

Max Harris

Max Harris - Max is a director of the company at only 19 years old. He started Saturdays and school holidays at the age of 15, rolling his sleeves up and working on site as a labourer. From this, he gained his maximum experience of the developing trade and now deals with the construction of our developments, from sub-structure through to completion of the units, making sure everything is delivered with an immaculate finish, ready for the new home owner. Max is a team player and crosses over in land and design also.

Calum Harris

Calum Harris - Calum Harris is the youngest member of the Vanquish team, not only working closely on planning and new land deals, but also the design and marketing of the developments with Mark. He is a director of the company along with Mark, Max and Jon. He has first hand experience working alongside Mark, continuously searching for new opportunities to develop. Calum has recently set up with Mark the New Homes sales department - selling the Vanquish homes direct from us taking it away from estate agents. At only 17, he secured over £1 million of property sales on his first weekend as a sales manager. A real apprentice.

Rae Cole - Rae is the personal assistant for the entire team at Vanquish and started the firm 2 years ago, coming from a long haul as a sales director at the South London Press. She first started as Mark's personal assistant, soon becoming the assistant for the group. She now looks after the group, all of its companies and is the 'mother' to the team. Rae also runs the New Homes sales department with Calum. She is a valuable member of Vanquish and responsible for it running from day-to-day.

Focus on Education

Construction is among the many courses on offer at West London's College

Study, career advice and work experience

Where other schools and colleges offer courses, West London's College helps young people and adults see the wider picture.

At West London the focus is on your whole career and not just the next year or two.

Our aim is to equip you with the skills you need for life. That includes independence, experience and truly impartial advice.

So at West London's College we ensure you don't spend all your time in the classroom – although as winners of the TES FE Award for outstanding use of technology, the experience you will get in the classroom or workshop is superb.

We ensure our courses are taught over four days or less than a week. It is not a matter of less classroom time; it is the same or more as elsewhere but focused into fewer days. You will learn faster and probably find it much easier. The rest of the time you have a choice. You can undertake private study either in college or wherever you choose, or you can get work and grow your experience in a job related to your career or course choice.

If you prefer you could get a job in an area unrelated to your studies and learn about something entirely new. The thing is, you have choices and we will support you wherever we can.

We also guarantee a work experience placement for all our 16-19 year old students on full time courses. We do this by working with Reed NCFE (who have already arranged work experience for hundreds of our students). It is a great experience and one that will help you to start building your career.

But before you decide on a career we have another quite unique offer for you. We offer you a totally impartial career advice service.

On our website we have details of careers, the salaries you are likely to get and the number of vacancies there has been in West London in the last three months.

The information is taken from advertised vacancies and is totally impartial.

We even advertise current vacancies so you can get an up to date view of your proposed career.

In a world where so many of our competitors fail to offer unbiased advice, we believe we stand out by being impartial. And in case you are wondering, this isn't just our opinion. We've been accredited by Matrix for our impartial information, advice and guidance. No other college has the same cross college accreditation we have been awarded.

So if you want to build a career check out our website at wlc.ac.uk or drop into our next open day.

Tutoring is more than just exam preparation

Clare Pelham, one of the founders of Chelsea and Fulham Tutors

As the competition for schools reaches staggering proportions, the number of private tutoring agencies has exploded.

Many of these agencies are run by young entrepreneurs from sleek London offices seeking to capitalise on the boom by paying their tutors a fraction of the high fees charged to clients.

Chelsea and Fulham Tutors operates on a different model. The founders, Clare Pelham and Alison Brunton, are parents of children who have successfully navigated school admissions for their combined total of five children.

Both have hired many tutors for their own children, while Clare is a tutor herself specialising in the 11-plus admissions exams and interviews.

As parents, they strive to offer better value to clients by running their business from home, charging a fraction of the commission fees of the larger agencies.

Chelsea and Fulham Tutors believe that the most effective method of learning is through one-to-one teaching by a tutor who acts as a mentor to the student.

As a smaller agency, they are able to personally match tutors to students. Private tutoring is more than just preparing students for exams; students must develop core life skills such as communication skills, organisational skills, evaluating arguments, analytical thinking, creativity, structuring and forming arguments, and asking questions. The agency's goal is to prepare students in a positive way to make the most of themselves during their education.

As parents, Clare and Alison also have a huge advantage as they have an unlimited source of fellow parents, students and teachers who have inside knowledge of the British school system.

They do not just help students during the admissions process, they can tell them about past and present students' personal experiences with particular schools. League table rankings only give a limited picture.

For example, some schools manipulate their A-level results by replacing the struggling students in the class with an intake at the start of the sixth form. Many parents wrongly assume their child has a school place until university. We support families by providing advice as a parent as well as an academic consultant.

The tutors at Chelsea and Fulham Tutors are second to none. Many are graduate students, teachers, full time tutors and all are friendly and personable. Most of our tutors are also registered with large agencies, but are attracted by our fair rates. They all have the highest academic qualifications and have been carefully selected by Alison and Clare. The pair only hire tutors they would hire for their own children.

The truth is that private tutoring is only one aspect of the question, "How do we best educate our child?" To help guide children successfully through early years and teenage years requires finding the right schools, giving them strong emotional support, building confidence and identifying their own special talents. The end goal must be to achieve a successful university entrance and to begin to identify a career that best suits their skills and interests.

Cypriot food with a modern twist

Gizli Restaurant brings a taste of North Cyprus like never before.

The definition of Gizli means secret/hidden which just sums us up to a tee. Enjoy our North Cypriot food with a modern twist along with Portuguese influences. Yes you read it right. How could that be? you ask yourself.

My name is Monica, owner and head chef of Gizli Restaurant. I grew up in Portugal and have been involved in my family run restaurant business since childhood, cooking, preparing and understanding our diners' needs was something I adopted naturally. Cooking is a huge passion of mine and not a chore.

Since meeting the love of my life 27 years ago from North Cyprus, I adopted the culinary delights that North Cyprus had to offer. I have a wonderful mother-in-law who taught me all the hidden secrets of good old fashioned Turkish food which is very rare to find on your high street these days.

I am so pleased to bring you homemade dishes and desserts from North Cyprus and Portugal.

My desserts are made from my heart. Enjoy the likes of panacotta, sutlac (rice pudding) cheese cake, chocolate mousse, tiramisu and Portuguese style creme brulee.

We have carefully selected the finest of award winning Turkish wines such as Cankaya (white wine) and Yakut (red) to name a few, to compliment any dish that you desire.

I feel it is important to provide the very best for our diners and for this reason I source my produce locally. Our meat is halal and on request I can make you gluten free Lahmacun (Turkish pizza).

Turkish pizza is no ordinary pizza and it is a must try. Very thin flat bread with lamb mince mixed with parsley, onion, tomato and peppers. Squeeze on fresh lemon, whack the side salad in, roll it up and enjoy.

Our aim is to please your every requirement and to take your palate to new experiences.

We can accommodate private functions and love to get involved in helping you celebrate your memorable moments.

At Gizli you come first time as a guest and then you are family, as I was welcomed in to my Turkish family 27 years ago.

Neapolitan taste is a real treat

If you're looking for food with an Italian flavour, then look no further than Il Pagliaccio in Wandsworth Bridge Road.

The restaurant specialises in delicious pizzas and tasty pastas straight from Naples – and promises an unforgettable evening in Fulham.

Take a trip to the west London restaurant and you will find a stunning a la carte menu, filled with favourites from the shores of the Mediterranean – and infused with the unique Il Pagliaccio finishing touches.

Whatever flavour floats your boat, you will find yourself tucking into a real treat at Il Pagliaccio – and it won't only be the food that tantalises the taste buds.

Not only is owner Teo Catino known all over London for his fantastic fine dining experience, he is also a hero in his local community.

Teo's generosity knows no bounds and he is always the first on the scene to raise money for all manner of charity causes – striving to put others ahead of himself at every opportunity.

Only last month Teo and the team hosted a fundraising pizza workshop for children and teachers from the local Sullivan Primary School, raising about £2,000 towards a life-changing spinal operation for nine-year-old Caya Newman.

When he is not helping others, Teo is hard at work organising events to complement the amazing food that is dished up from the Il Pagliaccio kitchen every night.

The restaurant is now taking bookings for a night to remember on Mothers' Day (Sunday, March 26), where cocktails will be on a special two for one offer all day.

Skip forward just a couple of weeks and the restaurant will be grooving to the sounds of Elvis Presley, when Lou Jordan – one of London's top Elvis tribute acts – takes to the stage as The King himself on Friday, April 7.

If Italian food is the order of the day, there is only one stop in town – Il Pagliaccio.

Shaping up – in time for your hols

If you are planning a summer holiday in 2017, you will already be counting down the days as winter slowly packs its bags and moves on for another year.

For most of us, though, that excitement will be mixed in with worry. Will we get to the airport on time? Will there be a problem with the hotel? What will the weather be like? But before jetting off to somewhere hot, our number one anxiety is always the same. How do I make sure I look fantastic?

When we daydream about those long afternoons relaxing beside the pool or sunning ourselves on the golden sand, we imagine ourselves in the best possible shape. But if you really want to make sure your holiday beach bod lives up to expectations, now is the time to put in the hard yards.

Committing to regular exercise and a healthy diet today can make the world of difference tomorrow – and three or four months down the line you'll be looking your brilliant best in time for that long-awaited break.

Getting into shape doesn't have to be all pain and misery, however. There are hundreds of new and exciting ways to shift those troublesome pounds.

Whether you find yourself signing up for a spin class or zumba session at the gym, plodding along with a running club or hiring a personal trainer to give you some tailored support, losing weight need not be a solo mission. Finding ways to inject a bit of healthy competition into your workout can also be a big help. Once you're striving towards a personal target – a fun run, perhaps, or a head-to-head contest against a friend – you'll soon forget all about your gym phobias.

Of course, exercise is only half the battle. Getting a good balance of the key food groups and binning the junk food will be just as important. But it only takes a little forethought in the kitchen to find a handful of new recipes that will keep your tastebuds entertained while shaking off those extra pounds. Leading a healthier lifestyle is not all about changing your appearance. Giving up some of your indulgences, you'll find yourself feeling fresher and more energised – just in time for that holiday.

Spring into Easter with some lighter feelings

I have worked with many Fears and Phobias including the popular spider phobia. A client became very agitated just talking about snakes before an overland journey; following hypnotherapy they had the holiday of a lifetime.

Construction sites have crazy heights on scaffolding; a client developed a fear of heights, after hypnotherapy they were able to carry on as normal.

A client had a fear of public speaking; a 'gag' in the throat prevented them speaking in front of a boardroom of directors; confidence returned following hypnotherapy.

You've revised for that exam; nerves get the better of you. Hypnotherapy helps relax that mind and body.

A 2014 Commonwealth Games competitor achieved Peak Performance through Hypnotherapy and other techniques.

Fear of Flying is my speciality, the one I enjoy the most. The challenge was to create a calming influence for a client who had cancelled career prospects through Fear of Flying. They were about to take a holiday with a loved one on a short haul and long haul return flight. The result was a very enjoyable holiday with hypnotherapy and others techniques. A musician taking teaching grades sensed that playing solo in a room was fine but could not face performing in front of others; following hypnotherapy that musician performs to large public audiences.

"I don't know how this [Hypnosis] works. It just does!"

Do YOU have a fear or phobia?

Phobias are often due to the fear of a situation that occurred sometime in the past being linked to something that might happen in the future. The result is that the mind triggers a mechanism that makes the body overreact to that situation whenever it, or even the thought of it, recurs.

A phobic trigger can affect a person's ability to do things that most other people see as no problem. Phobic triggers, or very stressful situations, can be a precursor to anxiety or panic attacks. A full on attack can bring on symptoms such as dizziness, fainting, lightheadedness, heart palpitations, fast breathing, tensing up, sweaty palms or feet, racing pulse, trembling, nausea or the urge to defecate.

A new look – a new you

No matter how blue you may be feeling, there is no denying that a makeover is a tried and tested trick for lifting the spirits.

Is the nine to five routine of work getting you down? Maybe you've fallen out with friends or family and need a pick-me-up? Perhaps you're feeling stressed about a job interview or exam on the horizon?

Whatever the diagnosis, a bit of pampering can work wonders in boosting your mood and helping you confront the next big challenge in your life.

Simply being good to yourself – trying out a new hairstyle, enjoying a spa day or having a massage – can have a huge impact on overall wellbeing and help you to keep focused on those all-important targets for 2017.

Sporting a new look can mean more than simply dressing up for an evening on the town. Restyling yourself can give you new perspective and help you make a clean break with the past – especially if you are starting a new chapter in your life.

Why not push the boat out? Try that haircut you've never had the confidence to try before. Treat yourself to a manicure or pedicure, or top up that tan on a sun bed.

Feeling good about the way you look can also reinvigorate you. Coming home after a trip to the salon, you'll find yourself more energised, confident and ready to tackle whatever life throws at you.

It's not only a beautifying session that can give you that boost, however. There's nothing like a relaxing spa day to flush out the stress and anxiety of everyday life. Sitting in the sauna, taking a leisurely swim or dozing off while receiving a massage can all help to iron out the creases and make sure you're feeling your best.

We all go through ups and downs from time to time – and there is no better solution than a spot of self-indulgence to lift the spirits.

Support Your Local Trader

Buying locally has many benefits

When it comes to shopping, there is a bewildering array of options. So many, in fact, that we often don't know where to start, writes Jack Dixon.

But when you next find yourself weighing up where to buy your groceries, stop to consider the local businesses that make our high streets what they are. We're talking about farmers, craftsmen, antique dealers and other producers. People who make items locally and sell them on a small scale.

As a consumer, you have the power to support these local traders – and you may find you pick up some handy benefits along the way.

Buying local foods can improve your health. When you purchase goods from local farmers, you'll be tucking into fruits and vegetables that you can be confident are chemical-free – as well as grass-fed meats, fresh eggs and dairy products direct from cows.

Investing in local businesses also means that your money stays in the community.

High street traders often work to support other local firms or charities, using their brands for the benefit of everyone. When you know the people behind the product, you're able to enjoy a special connection that you simply can't get from the major chains.

Along with the rest of the community, you celebrate when a popular local firm succeeds and mourn when it is forced to close its doors.

On top of that, you're likely to be buying from the people who go the extra mile to make sure you have that first class level of customer service. Because they rely on your custom to survive, local businesses treasure it – meaning you can expect the best every single time.

Once you've built up a relationship, your new best friend will know what you like. They can source the products you want at your request and can tailor services to make your experience even better. A local garden shop owner may learn about a new product on the market that can help you with a pest control problem that you mentioned on one of your visits, for instance.

Buying local has benefits beyond mere convenience. When you support local business owners, you get a better level of service as well as helping to make your community a better place to live.

Cat Power

Islington Assembly Hall, Islington
Wednesday March 15
Cat Power was originally the name of singer Chan Marshall's first band but has become the moniker of her musical projects ever since. Critics have noted the constant evolution of her sound, with a mix of punk, folk and blues on her early albums, with soul coming through on her most recent work. Her 2012 album Sun incorporated electronic elements in a move away from her usual fare.

Glass Animals

Indie band Glass Animals' latest release How To Be A Human Being is a scrapbook of their time spent on the road, gathering memories and perceptions of different types of people from all around the world. With two Annie Mac's Hottest Records on Radio 1 in the bag, rave album reviews and an incredible international story under their belt, Glass Animals are becoming adored globally.

Damien Jurado

Cecil Sharp House, Camden
Sunday March 19
Providing the ideal entry point for new fans and an intoxicating aural high for the faithful, Damien Jurado's new opus extends the hot streak ignited by 2012's Maraqopa and its 2014 follow-up Brothers And Sisters Of The Eternal Son. Cut with label mate Richard Swift at the latter's National Freedom recording facility in Oregon, Visions Of Us On The Land was released last year, completing the tale of an individual who has had to disappear from society in order to discover some universal truths.

IT'S the age-old dilemma for the character comedian – how to start again after crafting the perfect comic creation. Adored and despised in equal measure for his outrageous social faux pas and workplace pranks, Ricky Gervais' iconic monstrosity David Brent is so true to life that many still believe The Office is a genuine fly-on-the-wall documentary about life at a Slough paper merchants.

When Gervais brought the middle-management goof back to life last year as a shoddy salesman in the hit film David Brent: Life On The Road, it was both a riotous laugh-a-minute adventure and a tear-inducing human tragedy about faded dreams.

But if there's one stand-up who has been able to shake off the shackles of his comedy alter ego without sacrificing the artistic credibility of either, it would have to be Gervais.

Despite hitting the big time with The Office, his first significant comic adventure, he has gone on to carve out an enviable career at the height of his field.

Extras, Gervais' jobbing-actor sitcom, earned rave reviews – not least for its all-star celebrity cast, which included the likes of Patrick Stewart, Samuel L. Jackson and (Gervais' personal hero) David Bowie.

And a string of film credits – both in front of and behind the camera – further developed his artistic rep.

Previewing RICKY GERVAIS at Hammersmith

But, surprisingly to many, it was in the US where the Brent creation – and subsequently Gervais himself – really took off.

Now a household name across the Pond, Gervais is pals with some of the biggest names in Hollywood and is a regular pick as host for the Academy Awards ceremonies.

For all his fame though, the stage remains a constant lure for the Reading-born comic.

His latest show, Humanity, his fifth stand-up tour, arrives in West London this year, promising thrills, spills and more than a touch of controversy.

Gervais has touted the tour as (possibly) his final foray into stand-up, despite wild success with his previous performances, Science, Animals, Politics and Fame. But he says he is better prepared than ever to follow in Brent's footsteps out on the road. "It's called Humanity and the general theme seems to the world from the most privileged position imaginable," says Gervais.

"I've done a few warm-ups and it's definitely in the best shape of any of my shows at this stage at least.

"I also plan to do more warm-ups than usual as I want this to be my best show ever and possibly my last.

"Never say never – but with that attitude it will make me put every ounce of my soul into it."

The cheeky-chappy character – and his colourful Twitter persona – has earned Gervais a reputation for pushing back the boundaries.

He's among the most outspoken armchair commentators on all manner of political topics.

And his previous stand-up shows have flirted with subject matter considered too toxic for other comics.

Expect more of the same when Gervais lands in Hammersmith in October – it may be the last chance to catch him live, although there is no chance of Britain's most famous comedy export disappearing from our screens just yet.

Ricky Gervais will perform Humanity at the Eventim Apollo in Hammersmith between October 4 and 14. Tickets are available now.

Folk princess returns to London

FOLK princess Laura Marling returns to London this week to celebrate the release of her sixth studio album, Semper Femina.

Produced alongside US musician Blake Mills in late 2015, Marling released the record on her own label – More Alarming – on Friday.

The album follows Marling's directorial debut with the video for the first fruits of the record – and it's opening track – Soothing.

Marling says the inspiration for the song came from a series of vivid dreams she experienced while making the album.

Its loose lyrical thread strings together her keen, freshly observed take on womanhood – and what Marling describes as a particularly "masculine" time in her life.

"I started out writing Semper Femina as if a man was writing about a woman and then I thought, 'It's not a man, it's me'," she explains.

"I don't need to pretend it's a man to justify the intimacy or the way I'm looking and feeling about women.

"It's me looking specifically at women and feeling great empathy towards them – and by proxy towards myself."

The announcement of Semper Femina follows the success of Marling's recent podcast series, Reversal Of The Muse.

As an exploration of femininity in creativity, the collaborative project opened up an important conversation around whether the lack of feminine presence in the studio environment would ultimately make any difference at all to the creative outcome. Guests included HAIM, Karen Elson, Vanessa Parr, Dolly Parton, Shura and Emmylou Harris.

Semper Femina, Marling's sixth studio album in little over nine years, is a record that similarly addresses questions of how society views sexuality and gender but without seeking to provide definitive answers.

It retains an openness to express and portray her own voyage of self-discovery but also to develop and learn as an artist, performer and an individual over the course of her career.

Laura Marling will perform at the Roundhouse in Camden on Friday March 17.

FOLLOWING the lament by the retiring chief of the Royal Opera House that the British are prejudiced against the classical arts, this should get them cramming into the stalls.

The Northern Ballet is coming to town with a new take on the Casanova story which they promise has 'all the scandal you'd expect from a man who lived every minute in a whirlwind of excess'.

The famous womaniser lived for a while in Soho and Pall Mall in search of new conquests, and the ballet Casanova – due May 9 to 13 at Sadler's Wells – aims to unmask his debauchery.

"This spine-tingling spectacle of 18th-century decadence will flood your senses and take your breath away," promises the ballet company.

"Although consumed by his desires, there's more to the man. This original ballet will expose a story so sensational you won't believe it's real. Be the flame, not the moth, throw caution to the wind. Be led into temptation and unmask Casanova with Northern Ballet."

This sort of pitch should be music to the ears of Kasper Holten, who is leaving the Royal Opera House with the hope that the Brits will learn to more enthusiastically embrace arts like ballet and opera, just like we did with fine wine.

"If you look at how people talked about wine in this country 25 years ago, and how they now talk with knowledge, with care, with passion – I think there can be changes," he said.

"People say 'Oh, opera isn't for me.' They're missing out.

"We don't want them to miss out, we want them to share in what an incredible experience opera can be."

Northern Ballet appears to be thinking the same with its racy new take which has got the tickets selling fast at Sadler's Wells.

David Nixon, the company's artistic director, says: "Casanova's story is one of sex, romance, intrigue and scandal and I am looking forward to surprising our audiences and challenging the idea of Casanova as nothing more than a prolific lover."

Classic indie album goes live

YORKSHIRE indie rock legends The Cribs will celebrate the 10th anniversary of their acclaimed third album Men's Needs, Women's Needs, Whatever by playing the record in its entirety during a select run of UK headline dates this summer.

The record, a major hit in 2007, propelled the band from cult heroes to wider mainstream awareness, reaching number nine on NME's albums of the year list, as well as being named one of Rolling Stone magazine's records of the year in the US.

A special-edition pressing of the vinyl LP will also be available for the first time in a decade, courtesy of a gold reissue by Wichita Recordings.

Frontman Ryan Jarman said: "When writing an album, you (not so) secretly hope that 10 years down the line people will still care about it, still listen to it and get something out of it, whatever that may be.

"And so, ultimately, we just feel really lucky and honoured to be in a position where this conundrum of looking back versus moving forward is even a consideration.

"In short, this isn't The Cribs indulging ourselves and reliving the past – it's more just a big thank you to all of you who have been with us throughout the years, and a welcome aboard to those who missed it the first time around."

Following the success of the band's open-air show at Millennium Square last summer, this tour will mark The Cribs' first appearance at their hometown arena in Leeds, following a performance at the O2 Forum in North London.

Massive masterplan set to change face of Westminster

BY GEOFF BAKER

geoff@londonweeklynews.co.uk

A MASSIVE reform masterplan to change the face of Westminster has been announced by the council's new leader Nickie Aiken, who says she wants to end "thinking like a bureaucrat".

The "Aiken Plan" will include 2,000 more affordable homes, action on drunks and crime at West End pubs, a spruced-up Oxford Street, a new council-tax system that will see the end to small homes' owners paying the same as next-door millionaires, and a crackdown on those aiming to make a pile from short-term rents on homes.

Cllr Aiken says the ambitious plan "will ensure Westminster is confident, ready and prepared for a post-Brexit world".

Unveiling her programme at the launch of the third year of the council's City For All vision, Cllr Aiken said the challenge ahead is for the council "to get things done quicker, to think bigger, be more innovative and to work in different ways".

This will be required in order to meet the challenges of being at the heart of the capital and the social and economic issues that brings, she said.

Cllr Aiken has committed the council to three priorities:

- Setting the standard for civic leadership and responsibility that is more open, transparent and inclusive;
- Spreading opportunity and fairness across the City, providing more much-needed homes of every type and making sure policies are fit for purpose in order to deliver responsible growth;
- Ensuring Westminster is a world-class city by working with businesses to secure opportunities for future generations and to act responsibly.

Five new and detailed delivery programmes will allow residents to track progress against these priorities and include the following key projects:

- Deliver more houses, including building nearly 2,000 more affordable homes in the next five years and flipping the current 60:40 social to intermediate housing ratio;
- Work with residents, businesses and partners to bring forward plans to make Oxford Street a "world-class destination";
- Review of the council's planning policies to ensure they are fit for purpose and delivering the right conditions for growth, while ensuring the benefits of prosperity are spread evenly;
- Continue to tackle air pollution with a range of initiatives, including a new #DontBeldle campaign to encourage people to stop engine idling;
- Pilot a new licensing charter in pubs and clubs Leicester Square and Piccadilly to help the drinks industry take more responsibility and operate to higher standards;
- Launch a new rough-sleeping strategy to prevent rough sleeping and support people to rebuild their life;

- Launch a gig and shared economies charter with new rules for residents offering short-term rents at their homes.

A council spokesman explained: "The Westminster Licensing Charter is all about working with businesses that have a licence to serve alcohol to encourage them to do more to support vulnerable individuals in and around their premises and provide an opportunity to improve the working relationship between council, police and industry as a whole to tackle crime and promote responsible growth."

"We believe that partnership working is good practice and we have been clear that the initiative must be industry-led and voluntary for those who want to take part."

"We are working with the Heart of London Business Alliance to introduce a Best Bar None scheme to support premises to deliver exceptional practice and drive up standards across the board."

"BBN involves premises undertaking a voluntary assessment of how they operate with the best being recognised and rewarded for their achievements and others offered help to improve how they operate including designing out opportunities for crime, recruiting specialist support staff or simply putting in place more robust practices and policies."

"We have been successful in a bid to become part of the Home Office Local Alcohol Action Area programme, which shows a level of national interest in our idea and recognises Westminster as a leader in good practice."

"With regard to gig and sharing, this refers to companies who operate to help residents rent out their homes for short periods."

"We have no problem with responsible operators but it is the negative impacts that sometimes can occur which is where we do have an issue."

"We want to help this important sector to take responsibility for the way it operates and the sometimes-negative impact it can have. For example, this will mean if the 90-day limit on short-term lets cannot be managed by the industry, then the council will take action."

Cllr Aiken said: "The pace of technological change means our social and working habits are evolving faster than ever before. Innovation can be good but we need to ensure there are no unintended consequences so that change benefits our economy and our residents."

"We will launch a gig and shared economies charter to help this growing and important sector, such as short-term lets and some food delivery companies, to take responsibility for the way they operate and the sometimes-negative impact it can have on our city."

"I have asked Cllr Glanz to lead this important area of work. Let me be very clear – Westminster City Council has absolutely no desire to prevent householders legitimately short-letting their homes when on holiday."

"But when short-term letting becomes a commercial operation, we have a problem."

"We have seen at first hand the genuine and serious fallout for our residents from irresponsible short lets, more noise, more fly-tipping and more antisocial behaviour."

"So we will work with the industry to find a voluntary method of enforcement. But my message to them is clear – if you cannot enforce the 90-day limit then we will not rest until we have the means to do so. Ninety days means 90 days."

The council spokesman said: "In order to ensure that Westminster has the necessary resources, Cllr Aiken has pledged to work closely with the government in order that the council will retain sufficient revenues from business rates."

"She will also lead engagement with the government to look to recast the council-tax system, to request the flexibility to establish extra council-tax bands where those who can afford it will be asked to pay just a little bit more. For example, currently, someone in a £10 million property pays the same council tax as someone in a £300,000 property."

Cllr Aiken said: "As we seek to deliver our priorities, we also need to be a smarter council with a constructive approach – a council that thinks like a resident or a business and not a bureaucrat and one that has 'one front door' where all our services come together seamlessly for our customers."

"I look forward to working with councillor colleagues, our staff and partners to deliver the City for All programme for the year ahead. We want to create a city where prosperity is harnessed to support strong neighbourhoods and where everyone plays their part and has a stake in the community."

Further actions announced as part of the "Aiken Plan" include:

- Lead a city-wide engagement campaign called MyWestminster that will make sure everyone has a say in the decisions the council makes;
- Launching two new forums this year, a Young Westminster Open Forum and a Business Open Forum where the council will listen to businesses and their employees;
- Launching an action plan in response to the cross-party Community Cohesion Commission that has identified how to make the community more united;
- Holding a new MyWestminster Day that will be a day where people from different backgrounds come together and celebrate diversity and community;
- Open the Sir Simon Milton Westminster technical college in a partnership with Network Rail, Land Securities and BT to train the engineers of the future;
- To review and refresh council policies to move towards a tariff-based system for affordable housing, lobbying where appropriate for legislative change to enable the council to move away from negotiation on viability and focus on deliverability;
- Introduce a new standard for service delivery – the City for All Standard where all services will be checked to make sure they are being delivered from the viewpoint of the customer.

Corporation honoured for excellence in planning

THE City of London Corporation has won the Mayor's Award for Planning Excellence at the London Planning Awards, hailing the City Corporation as overall winner of the prestigious event for the planning and development sector.

The City Corporation also received the Mayor's Award as recognition for its win in the Best Conceptual Project category for the wind modelling of the Eastern Cluster.

"To minimise the wind impacts around a number of tall developments, engineers carried out assessments for the cluster of towers and wider City using a wind tunnel and computer fluid dynamics software," said a spokesman.

"The study concluded that there were more tranquil areas at the centre and to the east of the cluster while wind speeds increased around the cluster. Localised impacts were identified and assessed, ensuring a more robust and resilient understanding of wind patterns within and around the cluster."

"The wind modelling demonstrates how 3D technology can transform the understanding of London's urban environment and deliver better outcomes for planning, designing and building in the City."

Annie Hampson, chief planning officer at the City of London Corporation, said: "These awards recognise the outstanding work of our talented planning team, consultants and developers in improving the future City."

"With such strong entries across all fields, we are particularly proud to have received the Mayor's Prize for Planning Excellence across all categories."

"Our groundbreaking modelling ensures that the effect of tall buildings on the wider public realm is correctly analysed on an area-wide basis, recognising the growing relevance of pedestrian comfort and cyclists' safety in a densely populated City."

"Our modelling will inform new guidance and criteria for development schemes so these issues are considered at an early stage of the design process, resulting in better outcomes for London."

"This work aligns with advancing our air-pollution reduction ambitions, to create a sustainable City for workers, visitors and residents."

The London Planning Awards, organised by London First, celebrate the capital's top planning and development projects in partnership with expert judges from the mayor of London, London Councils, the Planning Officers Society and the Royal Town Planning Institute.

Hospice grant

ENGLAND'S oldest hospice has been given a £100,000 grant to improve its care for dementia sufferers in Hammersmith and Fulham.

The Royal Trinity Hospice in Clapham, which has provided end-of-life care for more than 125 years, received a cash injection from the City Bridge Trust to expand its community dementia service.

The hospice provides skilled compassionate care and support to people with progressive, life-limiting illnesses and their families.

The funding boost will enable it to expand the service into Hammersmith and Fulham and provide a dedicated permanent service in Kensington and Chelsea for the first time.

The trust is London's biggest independent grant-giver and the charitable arm of the City of London Corporation. It awards £20 million every year to tackle disadvantage across the capital.

Dallas Pounds, chief executive at the hospice, said: "Reducing health inequalities for people with dementia is a key priority for us and this award will help us ensure we can reach more people who need our help at home in West London."

"We look forward to working with other stakeholders in the area to ensure everyone living with dementia, and their carers, receive the best possible care as they approach the end of their life."

The psychologist is you

A Doctor Writes

As London plunges into the biggest mental-health crisis that the city has ever known, top Kensington psychologist Dr Shamender Talwar – who practises across West London – is launching in this newspaper a new easy-access direct consultancy aimed at helping the tens of thousands suffering from the illness. Today we present his first column

THE human spirit is far more powerful than any drug in the world, and that is what needs to be nourished with work, play, family and friendship – the simplest of things.

As a psychologist, I believe this principle is central to mental-health recovery, for all age groups and people from all walks of life.

Psychology experts are unfortunately labelled as followers of either Jung or Freud. I believe this is not the only choice. I say this because I am neither.

These two fine gentlemen have received much praise and acclaim as they were great psychologists in their own time. But their theories are historical. What was taught so many decades ago is not the everyday reality we find ourselves in now.

The past is past, and we as humans evolve every second. Our mind transforms every moment. Our thought process has never seen such reach.

And yet what is so frustrating is that when those who need support and help turn to the experts, they are met with old textbooks and questionnaires.

We need to understand that another way is possible. We have a role to play in this fight too. People are unaware of the psychologist within them.

I am a psychologist. And you too are a psychologist. The only difference between you and me is that while I am aware of it, you are completely unaware. But I shall teach you to find your psychologist within.

Mental illness can be confusing. It leaves those who suffer and those around them disempowered. But misconceptions need to be debunked in order to tackle these problems directly.

We may not always know the causes of a mental illness. It can be multi-causal, or a result of a traumatic incident. But to leave those who suffer from these issues to fend for themselves is already contributing to their demise.

A friend of mine lost a good friend to depression. He came to me confused and bewildered. "It doesn't feel real. I knew he was going through tough times but I didn't think he would do this." He said someone told him his friend's actions were selfish.

I responded: "Selfish? Is it selfish for someone to die of a heart attack because of overeating?"

To understand mental health, we need to step away from a medicalised model where it is treated by drugs and a checklist. Cardiologists have MRI/CT scans to understand illness. Bone doctors have X-rays.

But what does the psychologist have to understand the mind? Brain scans give insights into chemicals. But what about anxieties, thoughts and dreams?

Overcomplicated diagnoses, impersonal psychiatric sessions, and a distanced, scientific approach have led to more harm than good. More and more are dying.

But it doesn't have to be that way. We can help each other with mental illness, we do it with other matters all of the time. Haven't you given advice to anybody in your life? Haven't you ever supported loved ones in need?

What it takes is listening and having a chat. That's not hard. It takes friendship. That's not hard.

What if I told you that even maintaining eye contact or holding a conversation with someone is a form of psychology? That's not hard.

Facing up to mental health and engaging with those who need our help is the work of a psychologist. I do this not by reading a book, but by connecting with you.

I will show you the psychologist in you. Together we will find ways to ease and beat mental illness. It can be done and you can do it.

Connection is the key to open the front door of your mind.

■ Now, week by week, Dr Talwar will address common mental-health problems and ways to overcome them. If you or someone you care for has mental-health issues, send your questions to drtalwar@londonweeklynews.co.uk.

Writing for you every week, London's most outspoken entrepreneur

T-levels could hold key to an improved future workforce

IT'S been said that T-levels could be the greatest post-school educational evolution for 70 years, and I have to agree – if they get the right financial backing and support.

I've made no attempt to keep my views on Brexit a secret – and I still think that as a country, we made the wrong decision.

However, and rather ironically I should add, Brexit could turn out to be just what our government needs to give them a kick up the you-know-what and make politicians spring into action.

We need a complete overhaul of our methods of technical training for young people – something that I've said for years – and the Chancellor himself has now admitted that we're lagging behind.

During the Spring Budget, he mentioned how we're nearing the bottom of the international league table for technical education, 16th out of 20 to be precise, and it's a huge concern.

Countries like the US, Germany and so many others have been showing us the right way to do it for years and we've been stuck in our old ways.

Especially now that we're nearing a post-Brexit world, we need to follow in their footsteps and provide students with a route that is structured and clear – both for employers and the young people embarking on these qualifications.

T-levels have already seen some commitment. The plans, which are promised to involve a complete overhaul of our current methods of training, will have an initial £500 million backing, and the same amount per year once they're up and running, which will go towards paying for the new system.

Most importantly, T-levels will improve the skills of those heading into a technical career – but they could also be just what we need to reduce our NEET statistics. They'll allow 16- to 19-year-olds to study in 15 defined sectors, rather than stumbling their way around the 13,000 non-academic subjects currently in place.

And these aren't your typical technical subjects either. They'll range from hair and beauty, to social care and construction, and even finance and accountancy, not forgetting plumbing and building.

There'll also be maintenance loans available, like the one university students receive, should the young person want them, which I think is another way of signalling that vocational education is every bit the equal of one gained at a university.

For anyone looking for an easy ride, this isn't it. The number of hours that students train under the new system will total 900 per year, an increase of around 50 per cent. Each learner will also complete a three-month work placement as part of their course but spend a longer amount of time learning. Having a taste of a real working environment can only be a good thing.

Although the Chancellor's Budget wasn't so favourable for everyone involved, particularly for the self-employed, there seemed to be a particular focus on education.

In addition to 110 new free schools and funding for poorer families with gifted children, he outlined plans to upskill the country's workforce by spending £40 million on people wishing to retrain in their working life and increasing the number of people returning to work following substantial career breaks.

We've been promised the world in the past, plans that have proved nothing more than words said to keep us sweet. I just hope that T-levels in particular, which are supposed to come to fruition in 2019, make a start on preparing and improving our future workforce.

For many parents, having their child leave home to go to university can be a worrying time. Will they be safe? Are they eating properly or drinking too much? Are they getting any work done?

Now, with a new occasional column, we bring parents the inside story on life at university from Issey MacLennan, a first-year student from Wiltshire who is studying journalism at the University of the Arts in Holborn, reporting on what it's like being a Uni Girl in the capital

FOR many students in their first year, one of the most important things is your new flatmates. I wasn't made aware of who I would be living with until the day I moved in and so during the weeks between the flat-share offer and "Hello, I'm Issey", I was filled with dread as to who I would be living with.

Uni girl a student's life in the capital

I panicked that I would have nothing in common with them, or that none of us would speak to each other. I was wrong, of course, and sometimes now I wish we did have the occasional silence.

I moved in two weeks after the rest, due to family commitments called 'going to festivals', and so I was filled with anxiety that I wouldn't be able to bond with them in the same way that they already had. It also didn't help that I had then to wait even longer to meet four of them as they were working at London Fashion Week. So I had more dread.

But five months in and I can honestly say they are the most stressful but loveable people I could have been put with. Two study make-up and prosthetics, another two do fashion management and other is studying journalism along with myself. One has lived in Dubai for 12 years, another grew up in Switzerland and another is from Northern Ireland.

Two boys, four girls, and a crystallised gremlin growing in the toilet due to water leakage, a hazard of university digs.

You don't realise how much you love your flatmates until everyone starts to leave at the end of a semester and it's like re-experiencing the wrench when you left your family to first come to uni.

But sometimes they do drive you almost to insanity. There was the time of the Christmas party when one forgot their Secret Santa present but instead it was me who was dispatched from our halls in North Acton to fetch it in Bank.

Being from Wiltshire, I got lost for 40 minutes en route. When I got back my mate had gone, leaving only a drunken text message saying "I love yiu, so myxh", thus suspending me in worry as I attempted to find out if he was OK and could make it home safely, a process not greatly assisted by the fact that his phone had died.

But my fears were alleviated when he woke me up at 4am, bouncing through my door with a 'thank you' McDonald's, the kind thought only marred by the fact that he had eaten it himself on the way home.

He then climbed into my bed and forced me to put on Flushed Away on Netflix. This is the nature of academic study in the 21st century.

On other occasions, I've been fully asleep way after midnight and a flatmate has come into my room on the hunt for Dorito dip. As you do. At other times it's been because they need to borrow my highlighter, at 3am. This never happened at home.

Flatmates, the strangest family you will probably ever have. And I've got a year of this. I shall have to lock my door.

New Youth MP Aziz keen to 'start making a difference'

AZIZ Saiq, 16, has been elected Youth MP for Westminster.

Aa pupil at Marylebone's King Solomon Academy, Aziz is now the voice of young people in the borough and will have the chance to speak in the House of Commons.

Mohammed Awale, 17, also from King Solomon Academy, has been named Deputy Youth MP.

"This year is the first full year that Westminster's Youth MP is a member of the Youth Parliament, meaning that Aziz will get the opportunity to attend Youth Parliament conferences and speak and debate in the House of Commons in November," said a Westminster council spokesman. The Westminster Youth Elections 2017 saw 4,500 young people in Westminster have their say and turn out to vote for eight candidates over a three-week period.

Aziz and Mohammed will now act as the voice of young people and will work directly with key decision-makers in the council to help influence and shape local services for young people.

Aziz said: "I am delighted to be elected. It is a surreal feeling. I have a lot of goals that I want to achieve over the coming year so I am keen to get out there, meet the community and all those who voted for me and start making a difference."

Mohammed said: "I want to try to ensure that all young people have a say on the issues that affect them. I am really keen to work closely with Aziz in the coming year to try to achieve all we set out to do in our manifestos. It will be a team effort, not just for Aziz and I, but also the whole of the youth council."

In the Best Actor category, Ed Harris and Tom Hollander receive their first Olivier Award nominations for their performances in Buried Child and Travesties respectively. Jamie Parker receives his first nomination in this category for his portrayal of Harry Potter. Harry Potter And The Cursed Child's record-breaking 11 nominations ties with the current record holder for the most nominated production, Hairspray (2008). The Harry Potter play, which sees JK Rowling's magical world brought to life, is nominated in the following categories: Best Actor, Best Actor in a Supporting Role, Best Actress in a Supporting Role, Best New Play, Best Set Design, Best Lighting Design, Best Costume Design, Best Sound Design, Best Director, Best Theatre Choreographer and Outstanding Achievement in Music.

In the musical categories, Groundhog Day at The Old Vic leads with eight nominations including for Mastercard Best New Musical. Dreamgirls, School Of Rock The Musical and The Girls are also nominated.

English National Opera triumphs with five nominations – Akhnaten, Così Fan Tutte, as well as Stuart Skelton's performance in Tristan And Isolde and Mark Wigglesworth's musical direction of Don Giovanni and Lulu.

The Outstanding Achievement in an Affiliate Theatre category demonstrates the diversity of London's smaller theatres with four different venues nominated: for Cuttin' It at The Maria, Young Vic, The Government Inspector at Theatre Royal Stratford East, The Invisible Hand at Tricycle Theatre, It Is Easy To Be Dead at Trafalgar Studios 2 and Rotterdam at Trafalgar Studios 2.

Acclaimed actor and director Kenneth Branagh will be presented with a Special Award at the Olivier Awards 2017 ceremony on Sunday April 9 at the Royal Albert Hall.

The award will be presented in recognition of his outstanding contribution to British theatre.

Underwhelming VR world fails to captivate

REVIEW

Ugly Lies The Bone

National Theatre

METHODS of managing chronic pain have been back in the news again recently, with the issue of sufferers becoming addicted to the widely used morphine therapy an ever-present problem, writes Nicky Sweetland.

One alternative, which has been extensively researched, is the use of virtual reality to alleviate symptoms.

And in trials, at least 60 per cent of patients experienced around a 30 per cent reduction in pain compared to just a 25 per cent reduction from the use of morphine.

The story of an ex-serviceman who underwent a course of VR treatment became the inspiration for Lindsey Ferrentino's darkly comedic play Ugly Lies The Bone, which received its UK premiere at the National Theatre recently.

And although the subject is no laughing matter, the production gives a light-hearted and yet important insight into the traumatic lives of ex-service personnel.

We meet Jess (Kate Fleetwood), who has suffered severe burns after being hit by an IED in Afghanistan.

In constant, incapacitating pain, she has returned to Cape Canaveral, her hometown, and is struggling to come to terms with a mundane life filled with civilians, including her broccoli-obsessed sister (Olivia Darnley) and visionless ex-boyfriend (Ralf Little).

Her only escape comes from sessions with an almost ethereal VR therapist, in which she is able to disregard her injuries and run through snow-drenched forests in an alternative world built to help assuage her physical frustrations.

We are invited into Jess' virtual world, with snowy video projections and icy lighting.

But although Es Devlin's curved set at first seems ingenious, it sadly lacks the magical quality needed to memorise.

The action flits between the VR world and the dilapidated Florida town with a story that lacks any real purpose.

And with the underwhelming virtual world failing to captivate, we are left reliant on the characters, who are unfortunately slightly underdeveloped.

Fleetwood does a sterling job of sensitively portraying the material, however, and her impressive physical display will leave you wincing with every pained movement.

She's well supported by Ralf Little, who is excellent as her adorably irresponsible ex, whose lost his job with NASA and finds himself embracing a humdrum life as a gas-station attendant.

Olivia Darnley perfectly embodies a posttraumatic make-do-and-mend attitude as Kacie.

And Kris Marshall is scarily reminiscent of Scooby Doo's best friend Shaggy – a work-shy beach bum with a heart of gold.

It should be the VR scenes which captivate the imagination and showcase a mystical world in which to escape – but it's actually the touching interpretation of sisterly kinship and the sadness of lost opportunities that are the real winners in this production.

Ugly Lies the Bone is playing in the Lyttelton at the National Theatre until June 6. For more details, visit nationaltheatre.org.uk/shows/ugly-lies-the-bone.

Travesties
Apollo Theatre
?????

THE work of Tom Stoppard is enjoying a renaissance on the London stage this season, with his beloved Rosencrantz And Guildenstern Are Dead about to open at the Old Vic and his 1970s memory play, Travesties, bringing some much-needed mirth and merriment to the West End, writes Nicky Sweetland.

Travesties was inspired by a real-life performance of The Importance Of Being Earnest that James Joyce helped to stage in Zurich in 1918. And Patrick Marber's production enjoyed a sold-out run at the Menier Chocolate Factory prior to its transfer to the Apollo Theatre on Shaftesbury Avenue.

Stoppard's first diatribe might leave audiences dubious of their ability to endure a story told in such convoluted language.

But Tom Hallander's spritely portrayal of an elderly Henry Carr, who reminisces about his time in Zurich during the First World War, has such a childlike charm that we are cajoled along until the action really begins.

If you're unsure of your European political history, it might be prudent to swat up before you visit, as through a series of muddled recollections we are introduced to some of the most influential figures of the time.

Henry recounts his interactions with fellow residents of Zurich, which included James Joyce when he was writing Ulysses, Tristan Tzara during the rise of Dada and Lenin leading up to the Russian Revolution.

Stoppard's word-play is a showcase of the English language and celebrates it at every turn, with glittering exchanges interspersed with confused memories, in which the characters begin to merge into the reality.

Freddie Fox is masterful as Tzara, the romantic Dadaist, while Clare Foster and Amy Morgan display some excellent emotive interplay.

Marber's production is intellectually challenging but nevertheless highly entertaining and, quite rightly, puts comedy at its core.

Travesties is running at the Apollo Theatre until April 29. For more details, visit nimaxtheatres.com.

Vocally stunning newcomer steals the show

Wicked
Apollo Victoria
?????

THERE'S a new witch soaring high above the Apollo Victoria, as Willermijn Verkaik joins the cast of Wicked for their ongoing 10th anniversary celebrations, writes Nicky Sweetland.

Verkaik plays Elphaba, the green witch in the multi-award-winning stage spectacular, which charts the life and times of the Wicked Witch of the West and has become one of the biggest musicals in the world, with an estimated 50 million people making the journey into the Land of Oz.

It's not the first time the acclaimed Dutch actress has taken on the coveted leading role in the musical, having previously performed in the German, Dutch and Broadway productions as well as a stint in the West End. And her return has been celebrated by her legions of fans.

Wicked is based on the novel by Gregory Maguire and features characters from the magical world created by L Frank Baum in his famous story The Wizard Of Oz.

The story follows the green-skinned Wicked Witch of the West (called Elphaba, devised from the phonetics of Baum's initials LFB), who we follow from her first day at university up until her untimely demise at the hands of the Kansas farm girl Dorothy.

Along the way, we find she is not quite the cackling monster we all remember from the 1939 film, as she desperately seeks approval from both her classmates and from the charismatic political leader, in the shape of the Wizard.

Verkaik brings some wonderful physical comedy to the role of Elphaba, depicting the younger witch with the perfect amount of wide-eyed optimism, until the torment within eventually becomes apparent. Vocally stunning, her Defying Gravity to close Act One is an absolute sensation.

She joins Suzie Mathers, who gets better and better as the plucky good witch Glinda, Oliver Saville as the strapping Fiyero and Mark Curry, whose spritely Wizard is a real joy.

Sue Kelvin triumphantly returns to the role of Madame Morrible, giving an enchanting essence to the malicious schoolmistress and new recruit.

Sarah McNicholas gives a renewed vibrancy to the problematic role of the Witch of the East, Nessarose.

Wicked is still one of the biggest and best shows in town – and with outstanding music, breathtaking staging and a spellbinding story, it is a theatrical spectacular not to be missed.

Wicked is running at the Apollo, Victoria. For more details, visit wickedthemusical.co.uk.

Revitalised Rangers are looking upwards at last

ROCK bottom Rotherham United will not relish their visit to in-form Queens Park Rangers on Saturday.

Only West London neighbours Fulham have a better Championship record than QPR based on the last six matches. Four wins and a draw have hoisted Hoops nine points clear of the dreaded drop zone and they are now looking up instead of down.

In stark contrast, Rotherham arrive in W12 on the back of six consecutive defeats, 21 points from safety, three games without scoring and doomed to be playing in the third tier next season. Ironically, one of only four league wins came in their 1-0 victory over Rangers when the sides last met in South Yorkshire on December 10.

Millers have lost all but one of their 18 away matches – the exception being their 2-2 draw at Ipswich last October.

On Saturday, QPR followed last week's 2-1 home win against Barnsley with a highly creditable and richly deserved goalless draw at Leeds United, who are fourth in the table and unbeaten in their last six.

Manager Ian Holloway was understandably elated – not only by the result, but the manner of the visitors' all-round display at Elland Road. Although Leeds, as expected, had by far the majority of possession, QPR carved out 13 shots compared to the home side's six. And Leeds didn't muster even a single shot on target following their poor showing in a 1-1 draw at Fulham in midweek. So it wasn't R's fault that this one ended in stalemate.

"I'm so pleased with that performance," Holloway said. "We played so well and deserved at least a point. I'm so proud of my boys."

"Apart from taking our chances, we did everything we could. I can't fault the lads at all."

It's Rangers' first clean sheet since their win at Reading two months ago and only their second shut-out in 25 outings dating back to October.

"We applied ourselves brilliantly against a top Leeds team. On another day we take all three points."

Holloway acknowledged the good work of his skipper and centre-back Nedum Onuoha in particular when he pointed out: "We limited the top scorer in the league (22-goal Chris Wood) to scraps. Let's be perfectly honest, we carved out the better chances. Connor (Washington) had two decent opportunities which he'll take on another day."

The Northern Ireland international found himself clear on goal in the 14th minute but Leeds' 37-year-old keeper Robert Green, who left Loftus Road on a free transfer last summer after 121 games, capped his 600th league appearance with a fine save with his legs.

Washington missed a better chance in the second-half, when he did well to cut inside his marker but curled his shot well wide. Washington, and R's in general, need to be more clinical in their finishing if they are to rise above mid-table next season.

"Our game-plan was to counter and take the game to them. And that's what we did," continued Ollie.

"It's my (54th) birthday tomorrow – and the lads gave me a performance to celebrate a day early."

"Of course I'd have liked to see us get the win we deserved but to come here and play as well as we did is a good statement from my lads."

"The supporters (some 700 supporting Rangers in a crowd of almost 31,000) seemed to enjoy it. And that's a good feeling for me."

minute with a looping 25-yard strike.

After Daryl Murphy curled in a consolation for the hosts, Sessegnon might well have bagged himself a hat-trick when he earned the visitors a stoppage time penalty. He seemed keen to take it but, instead, USA international Tim Ream grabbed the ball... and drilled his spot-kick low but wide of the post. Ream becomes the sixth Fulham player to miss a penalty this season, extending their woeful tally of spot-kick misses to eight.

While Sessegnon rightly received most of the plaudits after the win at Newcastle, Whites eighth away league victory of this campaign and their best since they recorded 14 in 2000-01, Tom Cairney is also showing his class. The cultured midfielder with the educated left foot preceded his long-range strike at St James' Park – his career-best ninth goal of the season – with a similarly fine shot from outside the box in the 95th of last week's home match against in-form Leeds United to earn Whites a 1-1 draw.

It was the least Fulham deserved. Neeskens Kebano had what looked like a perfectly good goal disallowed when the officials failed to spot that his shot rebounded from the crossbar and landed inches over the goal-line before bouncing out. Had the Championship adopted the goal-line video technology now used in the Premier League, Fulham would probably now be in the play-off places. Let's hope this oversight doesn't prove costly.

Captain Cairney, 26, has praised Serbian coach Jokanović for the transformation in the club's fortunes, saying: "The manager and the staff have got to take a lot of credit. He has stabilised the club and transformed the way we play."

"The fans are enjoying our style of football and the club have given him a new contract, which is great to see."

In their last two games, Fulham dominated 62 per cent of possession at Newcastle, where they had not won since May 2009, and 73 per cent against fourth-placed Leeds.

Jokanović has vowed his team will stay in the hunt for a play-off spot: "We are going to fight. We are not in a position to be thinking about being a promoted team but we are thinking about pushing hard to push ourselves into the top six."

"If we are strong enough for the top six, then we will have a 25 per cent chance of being a Premier League team next season."

Cairney added: "The play-offs are definitely within our grasp. I think we've got enough ability in the squad, and the right staff in place, to creep into the top six."

"It could go down to the wire, as we play Sheffield Wednesday away in our last game of the season. If it does, it will be an amazing game to be involved in."

Here comes KP

SURREY have splashed the cash to re-sign free-hitting former England batsman Kevin Pietersen for this summer's T20 campaign.

Pietersen, who first joined Surrey in 2010 and last played for the county in 2015, revealed the news via video on his Facebook page while playing golf at Wentworth last week.

"I am so, so happy to be back with Surrey and back playing in England," he said.

He then tweeted from his @KP24 Twitter timeline: "Overwhelmed by the incredible support from English cricket fans about my signing with @surreyccricket! Thank you!"

South African-born Pietersen will miss the first four group games of the 2017 competition but is expected to make his first appearance of the season against Essex at the Kia Oval on July 19.

He will be available for the other 10 matches and the knockout stage, should Surrey progress that far in the contest.

"Re-signing KP is a massive boost to the club and the T20 Blast competition," said Surrey director of cricket Alec Stewart.

"To have a player of his undoubted calibre available to us will add strength and experience to our squad and I'm sure all our fans will enjoy seeing him back playing in England again."

"His work ethic and appetite for success are infectious and our squad have always enjoyed having him around the dressing room and performing out in the middle."

Play-offs beckon

Focus on Craven Cottage

PROMOTION-chasing Fulham will break into the top six of the Championship for the first time this season if they beat relegation-threatened Blackburn Rovers at Craven Cottage tonight (Tuesday).

Saturday's superb 3-1 victory at league leaders Newcastle United was Whites' fifth win in seven league games and left them just two points behind sixth-placed Sheffield Wednesday with a game in hand.

But three points against third-bottom Blackburn would see Whites leapfrog Wednesday, who were held to a draw at home by Burton and are not in action again until Friday night.

With Wolverhampton Wanderers, also fighting to stay out of the bottom three in 20th place, visiting SW6 on Saturday, back-to-back home games gives the West Londoners a great chance to reinforce their bid to return to the Premier League.

Head coach Slaviša Jokanović said: "It's a great step for us, we must play 10 more games and everything is open – even though some teams have more points than we have right now."

"On Tuesday night we are going to have another opportunity to fight for another three points. Our minds and bodies must be rested and we must be ready to fight again."

It will be interesting to see if 16-year-old left-back Ryan Sessegnon retains his place after sensationally scoring twice in the stunning victory in the north-east that completed a rare league double over Newcastle, who were beaten 1-0 on the opening night of the season at The Cottage.

Sessegnon, who made his first team debut last August, has started only 22 matches this season and made seven substitute appearances. But operating in an advanced role on the left wing, the Wandsworth-born teenager proved too much for the Newcastle defence. This first brace of his pro career takes his goals tally to six and it will be difficult to leave him out of the side.

If Sessegnon has the confidence to excel in front of 52,000 at St James' Park, surely his youthful exuberance, fearlessness and obvious talent can be crucial to Fulham's promotion push in the remaining games.

Jokanović said: "Sessegnon is working very well. We tried to use him in a little bit of a different position but in the past we have used him in more of an offensive position. "We expected that he could find the space in behind the back four of Newcastle and he did that twice. He finished with a great level of quality. He must be satisfied with the team and himself too."

In the 51st minute, Sessegnon passed the ball into the far corner of the net following a clever Sone Aluko's backheel and then fired home just before the hour mark. Tom Cairney had put Fulham ahead in the 15th

Conte contract lure

This week at
STAMFORD BRIDGE

By Paul Lagan

ANTONIO Conte is looking at a 'name your own price' deal as Roman Abramovich seeks to tie Chelsea's Italian head coach down to a new contract.

Conte, 47, is on the verge of winning the Premier League title in his first season at Stamford Bridge and the Russian owner wants to keep the former Juventus and Italy boss even longer than his current deal, which expires in July 2019.

But in earning £6.5million a year, a relatively low figure in top-flight coaching circles, Conte is well aware that he can command even more should the powerful and extremely wealthy Paris St-Germain come calling.

With Barcelona on the lookout for a new coach next season after Luis Enrique announced he was packing his bags at Camp Nou, Conte will surely be in the frame for that job too.

Then there is the unrelenting call from his homeland. Inter Milan have made it quite clear they want him and with his family still living in Italy, it might well be that Conte will put their needs above all else.

He has already suggested that he will bring his wife and daughter over to London next season but when push comes to shove, will they really want to come?

If his family says 'no', then he will have to either spend another year in the capital without them or opt to leave.

While personal family considerations are at the forefront of his decision-making, there is also the professional dynamic that is slowly coming into play – the season-after-winning-the-title syndrome.

Former Chelsea boss Jose Mourinho revealed last week that he, the club and players were guilty of not handling the defence of the 2015 Premier League championship very well.

Mourinho's 2015-16 campaign proved a disaster and he was sacked the following December with the club closer to the drop zone than the top.

Chelsea felt that the existing squad was sufficient to mount a title defence and would not sanction major restructuring. Mourinho wanted rid of players he felt were not required and bring in others to take a serious tilt at the Champions League. The stand-off resulted in one of the most depressing and chaotic pre-season preparations ever which continued into the start of the league season. It never recovered and Mourinho was gone.

Conte is well aware of this syndrome and is keen to address the playing squad for next season before committing himself to an extended deal.

He will find Abramovich much more accommodating this time round.

Now 10 points clear of Spurs and Manchester City ahead of Saturday's visit to Stoke City, Blues will be returning to the Champions League next season and Conte and Abramovich want a squad big and strong enough to cope with an assault on the cup with 'big ears' and on domestic trophies.

This shared desire will release at least a £200m transfer war chest for Conte to plunder.

If Conte's family do decide that London is the place to be, then it's simply a case of getting the transfer side of the business agreed and signed off. If all goes well, then Conte will expect to agree a new deal within a month but not sign it until the summer.

He is keen to keep talk of his new contract under wraps and avoid any off the field distractions until the title is won.

■ ONE player close to agreeing a new deal is Nemanja Matic.

The Serbian is out of favour at present, with Cesc Fabregas taking his central midfield berth, but Conte is aware that Matic's power will be sorely needed in the Champions League next season and wants to ensure the 28-year-old is fully committed to the task.

A new, improved deal from £100k a week to £120k might just do it. Seeing Fabregas move on might also be an added incentive to stay in SW6.

The Spain midfielder is saying all the right things about the club and his position in it just now but the realisation that he will again be only a squad player next season might just persuade the mercurially talented player his future lies beyond these borders. Italy looks increasingly his preferred port of call.

So who is on Conte's shopping list?

One surprise recruit could be Manchester United's exciting wide man Jesse Lingard. Much depends on current United boss Mourinho and if he will deal with his former paymasters; and also whether Lingard wants to leave Old Trafford.

Lingard's ability to easily move from winger to wing-back would bring extra versatility to Conte's formation options.

The young England star, 24, has a year left on his Old Trafford deal. His international career will depend on constant first team action at the top end of the Premier League. He has to decide if that will be more likely to happen in West London than Manchester.

It seems midfielders Tiemoue Bakayoko from Monaco and Atalanta's Franck Kessie are being heavily scouted, while Blues are again looking at Senegal centre-back Kalidou Koulibaly of Napoli.

The move for Koulibaly is significant and will confirm the end of John Terry's long and illustrious playing reign at Stamford Bridge. Terry is 36 and his 19-year career should culminate in him lifting the Premier League title for the fifth time in May.

LWN Sport went to press before last night's FA Cup encounter with Manchester United. If that match has gone well, Terry could add another league and cup double to his trophy cabinet.

His desire to go out as a title winner is the reason he turned down a January move to West Bromwich Albion.

Baggies' boss Tony Pulis, who is likely to see Swede Jonas Olsson leave The Hawthorns at the end of this campaign, is keen to add Terry to his squad and will look to the former England skipper in the summer.

Pulis said: "In January, he (Terry) wanted to stay with Chelsea. He wanted to stay there and be part of going out as a champion. If he becomes available in the summer, we'll sit down and have a little think about what we've got and what we haven't got, and we'll take it from there."

"Whether the situation changes, whether other people are involved or whether he signs another contract at Chelsea, we'll have to wait and see."

■ IN-form Eden Hazard won the Premier League's Goal of the Month award for February.

His mazy solo run and clinical right-footer that zipped past Petr Cech against Arsenal on February 4 saw him come out on top against seven other goals.

Hazard said: "It's always good to win trophies. It is not my most important target to win Goal of the Month, I want to win big trophies at the end of the season, but I can say in a few years' time to my kids that I scored a beautiful goal against Arsenal."

"It meant a lot for the fans and for us, because it was a derby and we won the game. The most important thing in football is that you win the game if you score a fantastic goal and I hope to score more goals like this."

CHELSEA Under-18s started their elite merit round with a convincing win against West Ham United.

While last week's 2-1 victory at the London Stadium extended the first team's Premier League lead, Jody Morris' youngsters thumped their counterparts 4-0 in East London.

Two goals from Callum Hudson-Odoi, a penalty from Luke McCormick and a second-half strike by Cole Dasilva ensured all three points.

■ CHELSEA Ladies completed their pre-season preparations with a 1-0 win over a tough Swedish side Kristianstads on Sunday.

New signing Erin Cuthbert hit the only goal of the game at Wheatsheaf Park, Staines.

Blues get their season underway on Sunday (2.00pm), when they face Doncaster Rovers Belles in the Women's FA Cup fifth round, again at Wheatsheaf Park.
